Mr. Chope: I hope that the promoter of the Bill, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), will be able to allay my concerns, but as the Bill stands, anybody who attends an emergency but is not employed by an NHS body will be discriminated against compared with someone who is so employed. Much as we all love the NHS, we recognise that the health service extends beyond it. Surely all those who are trying to assist during a medical emergency should be covered, irrespective of whether they are employed by a relevant NHS body. Amendment No. 3 would therefore leave out those words and would cover

"a person employed...in the provision of ambulance services (including air ambulance services), or of a person providing such services"— without qualification. Amendment No. 4 would do the same later in clause 1(2)(c).

Amendment No. 5 attempts to clarify, and indeed slightly restrict, the definition of people who would be deemed to be emergency workers when transporting organs, blood or equipment by inserting the word "medical" before the word "equipment". I have no argument with the Bill covering people doing such work, but it should not cover just any equipment or personnel. Why should a van carrying people who work in the NHS to their residences or hostel be covered, and why should that provision be restricted to NHS employees? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had to put that provision in at the behest of the Government, but we should treat all health workers equally, irrespective of whether they are employed by the NHS. They are all doing a good job, in my book. Amendment No. 9 is a consequential amendment, which would remove the definition of a relevant NHS body. The amendments have the virtue of clarifying and simplifying the Bill.

Amendment No. 12 would remove clause 5, but in my opinion the promoter of the Bill has the chance to decide what it should contain. Why is there any need to modify it? Why does he not have the self-confidence to believe that the Bill is the last word on the subject for a considerable time? We know that the Bill would repeal certain legislation and replace it with similar legislation, but this Bill would also create new crimes. Surely Parliament should be averse to allowing the Secretary of State to add new crimes to our criminal code without our having the chance to consider them in detail. Removing clause 5 would improve the Bill significantly.

Mr. Atkinson: I share the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) about the definition of emergency worker, whether the person works for the NHS or not. As an MP who represents a constituency that borders Scotland, I am aware that there are often differences between Scottish and English legislation. The Bill stipulates that employees should be persons but not Scotland. That could give rise to a difficult situation on the borders, as fire services from Scotland are often called to fight fires in England and vice versa. Something similar is true for ambulance services. Patients from my constituency go to English hospitals and also to the regional hospital on the other side of the border.

"employed by a fire and rescue authority in England and Wales",

Scottish legislation protects emergency workers only in Scotland, but a Scottish fireman attending an English fire who was obstructed or attacked south of the border would have no protection under the Bill. They would fall between the legislation of the two countries. Will the Minister clarify that point if he can?

Mr. Alan Williams: In discussions about the Bill, I was assured that its provisions would cover private ambulances working on behalf of the NHS and air ambulances. I have no doubt that if necessary, my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to expand on that interpretation.

Amendment No. 5 would have the perverse—and, I am sure, unintended—effect of limiting the definition of emergency workers carrying equipment to those carrying medical equipment. However, other equipment—for example, rescue equipment—also needs to be carried. The equipment needed to deal with an emergency will vary according to the emergency, so that protection is needed.

Amendment No. 12 would remove the power to add or delete provisions by order. One of the problems with yobbo groups in our society is that we never know who their next victim will be. I have received representations from mountain rescue groups and other organisations that want to be included in the provisions. An order would enable us to achieve that quickly without a full statute. I hope that explanation satisfies the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope).

Mr. Coaker: To remove any reference to the NHS, as the amendment would require, would mean that the offence would be too wide. There is no statutory definition of ambulance, so we need to explain in the Bill what is meant by an ambulance worker. Tying that provision to the one relating to the NHS provides that clarity.

If we accepted amendment No. 12, we would not have the ability to modify or review the legislation if it were necessary to deal with the problems that have been outlined.

Mr. Atkinson: Could the Minister deal with the points that were raised? He did not deal with my question about heather burning earlier, but can he explain the anomaly for Scottish firemen and ambulance workers operating in England, who do not appear to be protected by either Scottish or English legislation?

Mr. Coaker: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. Chope: In view of the time, the best thing is probably to conclude consideration on Report and go into some of the issues in more detail on Third Reading—so if that is the wish of the House, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Alan Williams.]

2.29 pm

Mr. Atkinson: I echo what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope): there are a number of issues still to be debated. Although we all wish the Bill a good passage, it does deserve a little more debate, and I therefore hope that, with pole position for the next opportunity, we can deal with them on Third Reading at that time.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 16 June.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. As I am sure that you are aware, the Protection of Private Gardens (Housing Development) Bill, promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark), attracts support across the Chamber and massively across the country. Thousands of people have written in to demand that the Bill be debated. Is it in order for a Government Whip to strangle that Bill through the process that we have just heard, to ensure that we do not have a proper debate—particularly when the Minister for Housing and Planning, Department for Communities and Local Government wrote in The Daily Telegraph only this morning that adequate protection for gardens apparently exists. We should have an opportunity to debate that and to strengthen the protection of our green spaces, but the Government have clearly shown by their intervention that they are not interested in proper parliamentary scrutiny of the process, or a breathing space for our green spaces.

Mr. Chope: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. This is not the usual complaint, because the Prime Minister endorsed the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) and thought that it should be debated.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Indeed, the Prime Minister said in an answer at Prime Minister's questions that Ministers would give their response to the Bill. They have not done that, yet an objection has been made from the Government Benches. Is that in order?

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Of course, if Opposition Members had not spoken for so long on the first Bill, we might well have reached that Bill—and, indeed, a number of other Bills, including my own, which could have been debated relatively briefly on Second Reading and then proceeded to Committee stage. If Opposition Members had not spoken for so long, they might have got what they wanted.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time has been reached when the House must move to the Adjournment debate. The points raised are, of course, relevant and on the record, but it is also known that there is a named day to debate that Bill in the House on Second Reading.

Health Care (Hastings)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

2.35 pm

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to celebrate the health service in Hastings and Rye, and the improvements that have taken place in the past eight years. Primary care services have been transformed, and in the main, general practitioners offer a more comprehensive service than ever before. The Marlborough health centre that was opened 18 months ago by my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid) is a fine example of the co-ordinated services that can be provided at local level. We look forward to three other such centres in the town.

The local Conquest hospital is performing well. As a result of the hard work and dedication of our magnificent staff, no one waits more than 13 weeks for out-patient treatment—the average wait is six weeks—and no one waits more than six months for surgery, with an average wait of eight weeks. In the past two years, an MRI scanner has been replaced and a new CT scanner has been installed. We have an ageing population, but a new cardiac care unit ensures that local people have access to life-saving treatment in their own locality. All of that is possible because of the Labour Government's reform and investment after years of under-investment. Our local primary care trusts—Hastings and St. Leonards and Bexhill and Rother—under the chairmanship of Marie Casey and John Barnes, with Toni Wilkinson as joint chief executive, have delivered precisely what the Government required.

The hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) has remained in the Chamber, and I suspect that he will support what I am about to say. Hastings, which was the 34th poorest town in Britain, has received significant extra funding to take account of the more challenging health outcomes for people living in less affluent areas. Why would anyone want to change a system or programme of delivery that is working? Three distinct areas of concern arise from the strategic health authority's proposal, which has caused disquiet—indeed, outright opposition—among local practitioners and the public. I hope that the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), will assuage our fears about the restructuring of local PCTs, the funding regime and the targeting of resources, and the reorganisation of Conquest hospital services, including the accident and emergency department.

The future of our PCT is important to local delivery. The Government recognise the need to target resources on the most needy and to use local commissioning for that purpose, which is why they set up local PCTs, such as Hastings and St. Leonards and Bexhill and Rother, that can work to that end. Hastings and St. Leonards PCT has not only worked effectively over the past four or five years but is on budget. It has shared resources with Bexhill and Rother PCT, and has a joint senior management so that it can secure the benefits of local delivery on an appropriate scale. The outcomes, such as a fall in teenage pregnancies, have proved the effectiveness of that arrangement.

To fulfil the Government's ambition of commissioning a patient-led NHS, the SHA suggested that there was a need to create an all-county organisation to the incredulity of local representatives, including MPs and the local councils. We have made our objections known, and I thank Ministers in the Department for insisting that the SHA consultation should consider retaining a local PCT in East Sussex to cover Hastings and Rother. That gave us considerable hope.

Unfortunately, although almost every organisation supported the retention of an excellent local service, the SHA has now recommended its original proposal for an all-county arrangement. The proposal is patently wrong and conflicts with Government policy. How can we possibly target poor areas if they must share their allocated resources with rich areas? That is not targeting at all.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, in answer to a parliamentary oral question, acknowledged that poor areas in rich regions face a particular challenge. The fact is that rich regions consume services at a much greater rate than their poorer neighbours. That is why the south-east of England is in such trouble. It is in the nature of the health service, and has always been, that richer middle-class areas will always create demand beyond their need and will soak up resources from poorer areas if they are given that opportunity.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister agreed at Prime Minister's questions on 26 April to consider the proposal, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has now had a chance to discuss it with him. I cannot overstate how seriously we view the issue. It would be a betrayal of Government policy to share out the resources that are intended to target the poor with the leafy glades of the west.

I know that, in other parts of the country, there are proposals for PCTs of a similar size as that proposed for Hastings and Rother but, in our area, the issue is even more important. The PCT in Hastings has managed to be in-budget and still deliver its objectives. Rumour has it that Sussex Downs and Weald—the PCT that would be joined—is £2 million overspent and that Eastbourne Downs PCT is about £8 million overspent. Why on earth should we pick up their debts?

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to me on 30 January and I have her letter here. She told me that, for the years 2007-08 and subsequently, the funding for the Hastings PCT would be £1,552 per person compared with the national average of £1,388 to reflect the special needs for the provision of GP services in Hastings. It is self-evident that if we lose the ability to receive the money for Hastings through a local PCT, that promise cannot be sustained.

The second reason why such targeted resources may not arrive is the next point that I want to raise—the proposal to top-slice funding for our local PCTs by 3 per cent. for the next two years. I have already acknowledged the significant increased funding that the local health economy has received. The promise, as demonstrated by the Secretary of State's letter, was that in the case of Hastings PCT—the increases in Rother were similar—we would receive an extra 9.1 per cent. for this year and an extra 9.4 per cent. for the year after. That is more than £10 million extra for the next two years. Now the SHA tells us that, because of the need to balance the books in each of those years, 3 per cent. of the budget will be withheld.

I well understand why the Government need to balance their books, but why on earth should it be fair to take from the poor, such as Hastings PCT, who have managed their budgets and give to the rich who have not? I have already mentioned the massive overspend in Sussex Downs and Weald PCT and Eastbourne Downs PCT. Furthermore, the overspend nationally appears to be about 1 per cent., so why should we who happen simply by misfortune to be in the south-east suffer more from an effective reduction of 3 per cent. compared with the national reduction of about 1 per cent.? I know that the Ministers have said that this will simply be a loan that will be repaid, but how will it be repaid? As a lawyer, I tell my hon. Friend the Minister that a loan means that there is either a programme for repayment or that it is a loan at will, which means that one can get the money back when one asks for it. What is it to be? What is the basis of the loan?

Surely it is wrong to disadvantage by administrative action areas such as Hastings, which the Secretary of State specifically says she wishes to advantage. It is the more galling when I say that Hastings PCT does such excellent work and within budget. If there is no Hastings PCT, who is the loan to be repaid to?

I come to my third point, but assure my hon. Friend that I have no vendetta against the SHA, although it may sound that way. However, it appears that, yet again, it is the villain of the piece. Earlier this year, we were presented with an SHA paper headed "Creating an NHS fit for the Future". It claims to be a consultation on improving services in Surrey and Sussex. The paper is described as a consultation, but states that "the provision of emergency and elective care needs to change".

I do not take the luddite view that nothing needs to change, but I believe that the SHA is starting from the wrong premise. In short, the proposals are that, in the future—from, I think, about 2009—acute services should be delivered at four possible venues: at super-specialist hospitals at one end and local health centres at the other. Quite right. There would then be two intermediate forms of general hospital: one sort dealing with major trauma and accident and emergency, and another sort having a subservient role, which in our case has been described by the local media as the cottage hospital option. The SHA proposes that, generally, populations of about 400,000 would be needed to support major acute accident and emergency centres.

In terms of the local delivery in my constituency, the East Sussex Hospitals NHS Trust is responsible for two general hospitals: the Conquest hospital in Hastings and Eastbourne district general hospital. Both have excellent accident and emergency provision, which local people wish to retain. Indeed, I would put it more strongly: that is not subject to negotiation. Of course, the SHA has not proposed the closure of major services at either hospital, but pre-emptive strikes are sometimes appropriate and prevention is always better than cure.

The problem is that the SHA suggests that major accident and emergency centres should operate across populations of about 400,000. That leads the residents of Hastings and Eastbourne, and their local newspapers, to read between the lines. They read that to mean that at least one of the hospitals will be downgraded. At present, both communities worry that it will be theirs. Both in Hastings and Eastbourne, local headlines refer to the downgrading to cottage hospital status. I took the view that that was nonsense. I asked the SHA to confirm that, whatever the changes, proposals for a cottage hospital were simply not on the cards. Imagine my surprise when I was told that open consultation meant that nothing could be discounted.

I want my hon. Friend to say unequivocally that the Conquest hospital—and perhaps Eastbourne district general hospital—will not become a cottage hospital and that, although new and expensive services may well be provided in more regional settings, the existing provision will be maintained. That must include accident and emergency provision and I will tell her why that is so important. Hastings and Eastbourne have ageing populations and the infrastructure in the south-east, including the A259 coast road, is extremely bad. My hon. Friends in the Department for Transport are seeking to do something about that, but that will be some time off. The idea of travelling in an emergency—be it a heart attack or a serious road traffic accident—distances of perhaps 30 miles on those blocked roads is a bizarre interpretation of the expression "improving services". That would be disastrous and could cost lives. It is a complete non-starter.

That worry has resulted in the "hands off the Conquest" campaign, which is being formed by the friends of the Conquest and led by John and Margaret Baker, who do so much work in the voluntary sector in supporting the hospital. That is very much supported by the local community and the Hastings and St. Leonards Observer is also currently running a campaign.

In conclusion, I suggest to my hon. Friend that the sorts of proposals that I have highlighted are, in terms of Government action, schizophrenic. On the one hand, the Government—through the then Minister of Communities and Local Government, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (David Miliband)—quite rightly say that local is good and that we must make more decisions locally. On the other, they—or the SHA, at least—suggest removing local services and centralising health care organisation and delivery.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate and assure the Minister that he speaks for the whole community in his analysis of the problems in Hastings and the Rother area. The arguments that he has deployed against the SHA are shared on a cross-party basis and I endorse his plea for the two-county PCT solution.

Michael Jabez Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support, which endorses what I have been telling my hon. Friend the Minister: nobody that I can find in Hastings and Rye supports the SHA proposals and I suspect that that is the case in Bexhill and Rother, as well. I look to her for assurances that that absurdity will not be pursued. Will she at the very least say no to a cottage hospital? I could not persuade her officials to say that, but perhaps she will say it today. I want to make it clear that a clean slate, as it has been put, of this nature creates unnecessary alarm and despondency. I suspect that it was not the only reason why we lost Hastings borough council to the Tories last Thursday, but it did not help.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster) on securing the debate. He expressed eloquently the strong local feelings in his area. Obviously, I noted the cross-party support for his comments.

I join my hon. Friend in the warm tribute that he paid to all the NHS and social care staff working in his local health community. Their commitment to the continual improvement of the local NHS and social care services is certainly to be commended. I know about that from personal experience because I visited the Conquest hospital at his invitation in November 2004. I witnessed at first hand what can be achieved by adopting a multidisciplinary approach to improving services and was very impressed with what I saw.

The current NHS structure is under review as part of the "Commissioning a patient-led NHS" programme. The aim of the programme is to make long-lasting improvements to the NHS and to build on the improvements that have already been made through extra investment in new and existing services. As part of the programme, the number of primary care trusts and strategic health authorities will be reduced. My hon. Friend will know that plans have recently been announced to merge Surrey and Sussex SHA and Kent and Medway SHA into one organisation: the south-east coast SHA.

The approach that we are adopting will lead to stronger commissioning powers for PCTs, which will ensure that patients have access to the right care more conveniently and quickly than before. We also know that the mergers will lead to savings of some £250 million, which we will be able to plough back into front-line services.

My hon. Friend is obviously concerned about the PCTs in his area. The proposals for the reconfiguration have been subject to a 14-week local consultation, which ended on 22 March. As he knows, decisions about the reconfiguration of PCTs will be announced as soon as possible, once the results of the consultations have been considered and any recommendations reviewed.

It is too early to say what decisions will be made, but I can assure my hon. Friend that the recommendations will be assessed against the criteria set out in "Commissioning a patient-led NHS". One of those criteria is the need to strengthen relationships between health care organisations and local authorities by bringing their boundaries closer together. At present, about 44 per cent. of PCTs are coterminous with local government boundaries. We hope that that number will increase significantly due to the reconfiguration of PCTs. The rationale is that a better framework will be provided to enable organisations to work together more closely to tackle priorities, such as reducing health inequalities and improving care for those with long-term conditions.

I am aware of the concerns that my hon. Friend has expressed very forcefully about the future of his PCT. I know that he has expressed those concerns in communication with my noble Friend Lord Warner, the Minister with responsibility for reform. I hope that I can assure my hon. Friend that we are aware not only of his concerns, but of those expressed by people in other parts of the country. We are trying to work as closely as possible with SHAs and Members of Parliament to ensure that those concerns are reflected. We are doing what we can to address them.

Michael Jabez Foster: What respective weight does my hon. Friend give to the SHA proposals and elected Members' proposals? Many hon. Members feel and are worried, perhaps wrongly, that the SHA is taken more account of, even though it is not an elected body.

Ms Winterton: We are examining a number of considerations. We examine the results of the consultation. We take into account the views of Members as part of that consultation process. It is important as well that we consider the criteria that we have set out to ensure that where we are looking for improvements through reconfigurations, they are met.

My hon. Friend has rightly drawn attention to the increase in spending on the NHS under this Government. That has been reflected at local level, not only through increased investment but through improvements in patient care. There have been reduced waiting times and improved patient outcomes. As he said, that is thanks to the extra investment and the dedication and commitment of his local staff. There has been extra investment, but I am aware also that despite that, the health economy in East Sussex is facing some financial difficulties.

My hon. Friend knows that strategic health authorities within this context are responsible for delivering overall financial balance for their local health communities. We want to see them working in partnership with local health providers to determine how best to use the funds allocated.

I understand that in helping the SHA to do that, 3 per cent. of all PCT budgets in Surrey and Sussex are to be top-sliced for 2006-07 and 2007-08 to help create a reserve so that the SHA can record financial balance across the region. I am informed that the Surrey and Sussex SHA is working to define a process and timetable for repayment of this funding where this is considered appropriate. The criteria for this repayment will be based on whether each PCT is already receiving its fair share of funding under the capitation formula and whether the individual health community has received a net benefit from the funding.

In the meantime, I am informed that the SHA will be considering how it can assist areas such as Hastings and Bexhill with capital resources to develop the local health infrastructure and to recognise the initial sacrifice being made in terms of revenue allocation.

My hon. Friend asked for further information on this issue. I understand that Candy Morris, the chief executive of Surrey and Sussex SHA, will be writing to him with further details of the SHA's overall financial plan and the process in relation to this issue.

I now respond to my hon. Friend's comments on the future of the Eastbourne district general and Conquest hospitals. As he is aware, the Surrey and Sussex SHA is currently working with local people, local government and other stakeholders to produce plans for modern health care services that are clinically and financially sustainable. This work began in 2005. The SHA is looking to ensure that local people and stakeholders have opportunities to get involved in developing the plan at the outset and on a continuing basis. These plans have been discussed with partners, patients and the public. I understand that they will be supported by a discussion document that is due to be published by the SHA towards the end of May.

In the meantime, I understand that work on the options for settings of care will continue, and this work will include an analysis of clinical and economic viability, of access and travel issues, of deliverability and of how the options fit with national policy. I understand that the SHA expects to begin full public consultation on the developed options in the autumn.

I cannot give my hon. Friend the specific assurances that he has asked for, but I will ensure that the strategic health authority is made aware of the comments that he has made today. I hope that I have been able to give him some reassurance, however. I know that he has been in touch with Lord Warner about the reconfiguration. The SHA will write to him with further details of the financial aspects of the matter, and I will ensure that it is made aware of all the comments that have been made today about the proposed local changes.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Project IRIS

1. Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): When he will publish the results and his assessment of Project IRIS. [70203]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Joan Ryan): The iris recognition immigration system—IRIS—provides fast, secure clearance through UK immigration controls for pre-assessed passengers, reducing the possibility of identity fraud. The project will be evaluated once the roll-out of all 10 IRIS barriers is complete in December 2006. The results will be published following the evaluation.

Mr. Wallace: The answer that the Home Office gave me in September 2005 was that evaluation would be complete in October 2005. As the Minister and her colleagues know, I have constantly asked for publication of the results of the pilot scheme and the Home Office has constantly denied me those results. Will the Minister take this opportunity to explain why, eight months after the evaluation of the pilot project, the Government have not published the results? Will she confirm that it has met—

Mr. Speaker: Order. One supplementary is fine.

Joan Ryan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question. I know of his interest in the matter and he is right: delivery of the project has been subject to some delay, albeit for some very good reasons. The pilot phase was extended after the terrorist attacks on 7 July 2005. Enrolment stations were closed and staff were deployed elsewhere to give the project supplier, Sagem, more time to demonstrate system stability. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the response to his question to the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), was that evaluation of the pilot roll-out was scheduled for completion by the end of summer 2006 and key findings would be reported within that time scale. I am pleased to tell him that the pilot roll-out is complete and I shall report my key findings within the time scale he was given. The project is important, so we think it is better to get it right rather than to rush it.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend commissioned any research to bottom the controversy that appears to be raging about changes to iris patterns, especially in pregnancy? The matter was denied by the man who developed the iris recognition project when he appeared before the Select Committee on Science and Technology a few days ago, but we should at least carry out research to prove, or otherwise, the claims that are being made.

Joan Ryan: My hon. Friend makes an important point about Project IRIS. There is ongoing research and review at all stages. I shall ensure that the information about changing iris patterns is taken on board and I will keep in contact with my hon. Friend to keep him up to date as we take note of research findings.

Antisocial Behaviour

2. Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of individual support orders attached to antisocial behaviour orders in preventing escalation of antisocial behaviour. [70205]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Mr. Liam Byrne): Although there are only a small number of individual support orders to look at in detail, a positive picture is already emerging about how young people's behaviour is changing, which is why we are keen to see ISOs used more widely as an effective tool in the future.

Ann Coffey: As my hon. Friend is aware, most antisocial behaviour orders are applied for and issued on criminal conviction, when often a pattern of criminal behaviour has been established. Does he agree that the earlier agencies intervene the more chance there is of preventing young people from developing criminal behaviour? It is disappointing, therefore, that so few applications have been made for stand-alone civil antisocial behaviour orders with individual support orders attached? As he knows, they are designed to tackle the underlying causes of a young person's antisocial behaviour before they begin to offend. Will he review the use being made of individual—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That will be fine.

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend has a long and proud record in helping to tackle antisocial behaviour in her constituency, which is, I am sure, why she has so much to say about the matter. As she knows, ISOs allow positive conditions to be attached to ASBOs for up to six months. We are keen to see them expanded, which is why we gave youth offending teams £500,000 to support their take-up, and I am glad to be able to tell my hon. Friend that take-up is rising very rapidly indeed.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I find increasingly that ASBOs, especially when sought by local authorities, are cumbersome in terms of paper work and very expensive—sometimes more than £10,000 a time. Does the Minister share my anxieties on that front, and will he look at ways of streamlining the procedure and making it a little cheaper?

Mr. Byrne: A number of my right hon. and hon. Friends have told the House that we are very committed to considering how antisocial behaviour and local injunctions and other measures can be used and streamlined to ensure that they are more effective. They are, of course, part of a package of measures, such as warning letters, acceptable behaviour contracts, parenting contracts, parenting orders, injunctions and fixed penalty notices for disorder. A wide array of instruments are available to local authorities and to the police now, thanks to the antisocial behaviour legislation that the Government have driven through.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): My hon. Friend will have a long reading list, as he reads himself into his welcome new appointment, but will he include last year's report of the Home Affairs Committee on antisocial behaviour, particularly our conclusion that significant funds in urban redevelopment, regeneration, social services and education could be brought to bear much more effectively on the support of individuals and dysfunctional families by using individual support orders and other means? Will he apply his mind to ways of ensuring that that money is well spent on those difficult and disruptive families?

Mr. Byrne: I am glad to tell my right hon. Friend that the Home Affairs Committee's report was on my reading list over the weekend, and I greatly enjoyed it. He will know that the reforms that we have proposed for the months to come include reform of youth provision, £52 million for extended parenting support and £28 million for intensive family support projects throughout the country. Yes, we intend to toughen the sanctions for those who commit antisocial behaviour and cause hell for their neighbours and communities, but effective support for those families must be part of the deal.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Given the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) about the cost of ASBOs, is the Minister convinced that, in all cases, the police thoroughly follow up ASBOs, because there seems little point in issuing them if they are not properly enforced?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman is right to make that point. It is important that breaches of ASBOs are followed up and that offenders are given a clear message that, where there are breaches, there will be sanctions. Between 2000 and 2003, nearly 800 breaches of ASBOs were reported to us, 437 of which resulted in a custodial sentence being imposed, so it is absolutely right to say that a clear message must be sent when ASBOs are breached.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Does the Minister believe that drug-related antisocial behaviour is an emergency that requires a 999 number to be dialled or a non-emergency that requires a 101 number to be dialled?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman and I have in common a part of Birmingham where antisocial behaviour has been a problem for some years, and he will know that the response that is required depends on the circumstances in which the breach of an ASBO occurs: professionals working on the front line should make that judgment, not a Minister standing at the Dispatch Box.

Probation Service

3. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What plans he has to increase the resources of the probation service to take account of his proposed measures on overseas prisoner removals. [70206]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (John Reid): Before answering the question, I should like to take the opportunity to offer my own heartfelt condolences to the family of Nisha Patel-Nasri, whose tragic death in the early hours of Friday morning touched us all. The role of the special constable is often a forgotten one, but I believe that I speak for the whole House in thanking that group of public servants, whose endeavours provide a invaluable link between a local community and its police service.

My first priority is to protect the public by addressing urgently the need to identify, control, consider for deportation and, where appropriate, deport those foreign nationals released from prison where no such process was applied. Additional resources are being allocated to that task. In slightly slower time, I will formulate proposals based on recent experience and my analysis of underlying problems. That process of investigation was started by my predecessor, and as it proceeds it is uncovering systemic problems that need to be addressed, and I will address them.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): May I and my right hon. and hon. Friends associate ourselves with the Home Secretary's comments about Special Constable Nisha Patel-Nasri?

The Home Secretary will be aware of the role played by the probation service in supervising some overseas prisoners already released into the community, but he will be aware that, with things such as custody plus and the new special orders that will come into place, the probation service's resources are under very great pressure indeed. If it is to be effective, will he, in his new role, review the resources available to that service, to ensure that it can continue to do its very professional job?

John Reid: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his comments about the hard work being done by the probation service. From his previous experience as a Minister covering probation between 1992 and 1993, I know that he will understand the work that is done and the great challenges that are faced. On his substantial point, there has already been an increase in probation service resources and in personnel—I think from some 14,000 people to 20,000. We have certainly had 5,000 extra since 2001. In addition, we are revising and reforming the probation service under the National Offender Management Service. However, neither of those two things leads me to believe that we have anything like perfection. As I study the urgent requirements—following up in the case of the deportees, which has engaged the House—I believe that we are uncovering some very serious and systemic underlying problems in the relationship between prisons, probation, deportations and so on. I hope, in the not too distant future, to come to the House not with solutions, but with a statement about what I think the problems are and how I think we should proceed in solving them. Resources may be one of those aspects.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): In his second recent statement to the House on overseas prisoner removals, my right hon. Friend's predecessor referred to prisoners being deported straight from prison. May I remind my right hon. Friend of the fire that was deliberately started at the Yarl's Wood removal centre in 2002? One of the features of that incident was the presence of prisoners en route to deportation who had been convicted of violent crimes, mixed with ordinary failed asylum seekers and looked after by staff untrained in dealing with formerly violent prisoners. Will he review the current practice and try to ensure that potentially violent prisoners are removed straight from prison and not via the detention estate?

John Reid: I shall look at that, among many other aspects. As I said, I hope to come to the House with a statement in the not too distant future. There are three things that I ought to attend to. The first is the urgent nature of the discovery and consideration for deportation of those 1,023—now accurately defined as 1,019—people who were released without due consideration. The second is continuing the process started by my predecessor of examining the underlying problems—one of which may be what my hon. Friend mentioned. Thirdly, there is setting the shape for the future. In that, I have no doubt personally that it is the feeling of the people of this country—and ought to be the position of the Government—that any foreign nationals who are convicted and serve a significant custodial sentence in this country should face deportation when that is finished.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): May I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his eighth promotion, which I am told brings him perilously close to the dispute between Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street? Has he noted how fitting it is that one of his first tasks as Home Secretary is to deal with the problem of the Afghan highjackers? May I suggest that he would get off to a flying start if he sent them home and brought the British troops back, as I advised him in his previous appointment?

John Reid: As I move effortlessly from position to position—[Hon. Members: "Higher, higher."] Such support will no doubt endear me to the Labour party conference. As I shift endlessly from position to position, I find that the hon. Gentleman, with great ease, shadows me to the point of stalking. On this occasion, I have had quite enough difficulty coping with the dangerous terrain of Afghanistan under his supervision, without entering the even more dangerous territory of Downing street.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Is not the most fundamental issue relating to overseas prisoners the identification of those prisoners in the first place? At present, neither the police nor the Prison Service have any way of verifying the information that is given to them by the individuals who present themselves. Is that not the best argument yet for having an identity register?

John Reid: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. One of the many problems that we face is that at no stage of the whole process—through investigation, arrest, inquiry, interview, trial, sentencing, consideration, custodial sentence and release—as far as I have been able to determine in the limited time that has been available to me, is there any legal requirement on anyone to be responsible for discovering a nationality, or indeed, on anyone else, to volunteer their nationality. That is a not inconsiderable problem when it comes to dealing with foreign nationals. As my hon. Friend says, this is one of the areas in which identity cards would be a huge boon.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will the Home Secretary accept that one of the underlying problems to which he refers in the context of the probation service's costs and resources is the cost of being involved in questions of deportation, extradition, control orders and the like, all of which fall within the framework of the Human Rights Act 1998 in one form or another? Will he thus look to reducing that cost by repealing or amending the Act so that we can guarantee that the public's safety in this country comes before so-called human rights?

John Reid: Just as the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir Peter Tapsell) has a route map on which all roads appear to lead to Afghanistan, in the case of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), all roads appear to lead to Europe. Let me address the question of the Human Rights Act. People in this country want a system of law and order and justice that is intrinsically fair as enshrined in law, and by "fair" I mean getting a balance between the rights of one individual and the rights and safety of millions of other individuals. Secondly, they want the interpretation of the law to be fair and, thirdly, they want the administration of the law to be competent and fair. Those three areas are at the forefront of my mind as I approach my new position, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will attempt to achieve those aims. If legislation is needed, we will consider it, but if the matter is merely one of interpretation and competence, we will deal with it in such a way. We will end up with laws that are interpreted and applied in a system that the people of this country believe to be fair to the vast majority of decent, law-abiding citizens, as well as other individuals.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is any responsibility being taken by the most senior civil servants who were then in the Home Office and the Prison Service for the failure to deport those overseas prisoners who certainly should have been deported? Although the political head obviously takes responsibility, as the Home Secretary's predecessor did, should not the people to whom I refer recognise their responsibility for the failure that undoubtedly occurred?

John Reid: I ought to pay tribute to my predecessor in this post because I believe that he was a big man in every way. He took responsibility for a series of serious matters and mistakes, which, ultimately, he probably discovered only relatively lately. He took responsibility for beginning to remedy the problems, and we should accept that he dealt with the situation in a very honourable fashion. As elected politicians, it is in the nature of our position that we are quite rightly often expected to bear the burden of responsibility for our Departments and not to lay the blame on civil servants, and he was careful not to do that. In fairness to some of the leading members of the Department—I include in that group the permanent secretary and several other directors—they have relatively recently arrived in post. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) that they will be engaged fully in answering to me to make sure that some of the underlying and long-standing problems of the Department are rectified.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I associate myself with the condolences offered by the Home Secretary to the friends, relatives and colleagues of Nisha Nasri. I also add my admiration for the courage of that remarkable young lady.

When does the Home Secretary believe that he will fulfil the Prime Minister's undertaking of 3 May automatically to deport every foreign national who has served a prison sentence?

John Reid: It is my aim, as I made plain today, to ensure that foreign nationals who serve significant custodial sentences—[Hon. Members: "Significant."]—in this country face deportation automatically. Five days into my position, I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman a date by which that will be achieved, but I can assure him that that is my strategic objective. I hope to come, in the not too distant future, to the House with a statement outlining honestly what I see as some of the underlying problems, and thereafter to make proposals on how they may be rectified. I cannot at this stage tell him in what time scale the proposals will be put forward, because I want to ensure that we all, as openly as possible, address underlying problems, which I believe in some cases have been in existence for decades, not just weeks, months or years.

David Davis: I thank the Home Secretary for that answer. When I put the question to him, I was careful to use the Prime Minister's exact words. I note that the Home Secretary did not use the same words, and I understand why—because we have to deal with realities at the Dispatch Box, not overblown rhetoric. In terms of reality, may we have some facts on the 1,023 foreign prisoners released without consideration, who were referred to earlier? As of today, how many have been deported; how many have been detained; how many have committed further crimes; and how many does he expect to deport, and by when?

John Reid: On the last question, as the right hon. Gentleman does not himself engage in overblown rhetoric, he would not expect me to give him an expectation at this stage by which time all of this will be completed. What I can do is give him what information I have; I can do no better than that.

Of the most serious offenders, which the right hon. Gentleman will recall include rape, murder, manslaughter and sexual abuse against children, the current figure, having updated the categories by two methods—one is by redefinition, to include some serious offences that I thought ought to have been included in the first place within the more serious category; the second is to have scrutinised, or rather the police to have scrutinised, each case out of 800 on their way to 1,023, with a view to previous offences and reoffenders—is 35, of whom 26 are already under control. All of them have been considered, and the initial consideration has resulted in deportation decisions in 29 of them. Two only have been not considered for deportation, and I am asking for details of why not, and one has been deported. Of the more serious categories, we now include in that 144, of whom 55 are under control—the House should remember that some 70-odd of these were recategorised only a few days ago as being more serious—129 considered, 115 decisions to deport, 15 not and six actually deported. I shall not go through the rest of the details, but I will supply them to the right hon. Gentleman in writing.

Police Community Support Officers

4. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of police community support officers. [70207]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): A national evaluation of police community support officers was published on 26 January this year. The report found that PCSOs have been well received by the public and that they are valued for their visibility and accessibility. They are helping to restore respect in local communities by providing reassurance and tackling antisocial behaviour and low-level crime.

Tony Baldry: Thames Valley police estimate that over the next 18 months they will need to recruit between 26 and 32 community support officers in my constituency to provide proper coverage. So far, they have recruited just six. There appear to be two problems: vetting, which seems to be very cumbersome, and funding. The Government fund only 75 per cent. of the posts, so Thames Valley police have to find the 25 per cent. from other Government programmes, which does not seem particularly joined up. Indeed, at the moment, Horton hospital is funding two of the community support officers. I must tell the Minister that between the spin and the reality lies frustration.

Mr. Coaker: Vetting is extremely important to ensure that the right calibre of people become police community support officers. We are providing significant funding for neighbourhood policing, including for PCSOs, over the next two years, and we have made it clear that our investment will be maintained after 2008. However, community safety is an outcome shared by a number of agencies, and it is appropriate that other partners contribute and that money is used from the safer and stronger communities fund and the neighbourhood renewal fund. If all those agencies work together, we shall see PCSOs not only in the hon. Gentleman's constituency but across the country.

Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Wavertree) (Lab) rose—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Jane Kennedy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House. May I warmly welcome my hon. Friend to his new portfolio on the Front Bench? I look forward to holding him to account in the friendliest way possible in the weeks and months to come.

In Liverpool, 69 community support officers are ably supporting the police and are well deployed and appreciated. However, Liverpool city council also employs 39 street crime wardens and, to the dismay of the chief constable, they wear an almost identical uniform to that of police officers. Will my hon. Friend keep an eye on such otherwise laudable anti-crime initiatives, which have the potential to create confusion and undermine confidence in excellent community support officers?

Mr. Coaker: I thank my right hon. Friend for her welcome. I hope to ensure that I work in such a way that the accountability of which she talks will be a matter of pride for both of us.

The matter of uniforms issued to PCSOs is an operational one for chief officers. However, I believe that the common standard uniform set out by the Association of Chief Police Officers distinguishes PCSOs from police officers, while clearly identifying them as members of the police family. I congratulate Liverpool city council on its street wardens and on the work that PCSOs are doing in my right hon. Friend's area and others to reduce crime.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): May I add my congratulations to the Minister? My recollection is that as a Back Bencher serving on Standing Committees considering police and criminal legislation he was extremely robust in encouraging Ministers to take tougher action. I hope that that zeal has not been lost now that he finds himself in their position.

The Minister will recall that a major issue of dispute between the Government and the Opposition was giving community support officers the power to detain people for up to 30 minutes, and it was decided to trial it in a few forces. In how many forces do CSOs now have the power of detention, and on how many occasions, as we suspected, was 30 minutes not adequate to enable a real police officer to turn up to turn detention into arrest?

Mr. Coaker: I say to the hon. Gentleman, with whom I served on the Committee considering the Anti-social Behaviour Act in 2003, that I shall certainly maintain a robust attitude to antisocial behaviour and to crime in general. I do not have the figures on the number of areas where the power to detain has been given to PCSOs, but he will no doubt be pleased, as I am, that the Police and Justice Bill, which is before Parliament, contains a measure to standardise the powers for police community support officers across the country, one of which will be the power to detain for 30 minutes.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

5. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): What steps he is taking to clear the backlog of cases at the immigration and nationality directorate. [70209]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): We have published our five-year comprehensive strategy for immigration and asylum. The issue of backlogs cannot be viewed in isolation from that overall strategy. We have developed plans to deal with immigration applications including the points-based system and the new asylum model, so that we do not simply get into the position of recreating a problem of backlogs in future. We think that we have got on top of the challenge of intake, and that has given us an opportunity to turn our attention to backlogs, which increasingly will be our focus. That has been possible only because of our redesigning of the managed migration processes and our reducing asylum intake.

Keith Vaz: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on retaining his position in the Home Office despite the fact that so much has changed around him? In the 19 years I have been a Member of Parliament, hon. Members on both sides of the House, including me, have criticised the chronic malfunctioning of the immigration and nationality directorate. Indeed, before my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) resigned as Home Secretary, he referred to its systemic failures. Will the Minister confirm that there is no question of any bonuses being paid to IND senior officials until the entire backlog of cases has been cleared, and all outstanding matters have been resolved?

Mr. McNulty: May I start by thanking my hon. Friend for the welcome which, I think, he extended to me? I thank him, too, for commenting on the recent improvements in performance, but I afraid that it is not for me to discuss in detail at the Dispatch Box human resources, or pay and conditions for any civil servant, for reasons that he will understand. Staying on top of the backlogs at the IND and dealing with them is a matter to which we are devoting serious concentration and effort.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Does the Minister expect the IND's work load to increase when foreign prisoners facing deportation claim asylum at the end of their sentence?

Mr. McNulty: That is always a consideration that we must bear in mind, not simply in the light of the existing difficulties with foreign national prisoners but as a general point and a matter of law. The hon. Lady makes an entirely fair point.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Is there anything special about the IND, because it seems to lose a large number of files? In approximately one in 20 cases with which I deal, I receive an answer saying that the file has been mislaid or lost. Something has gone wrong, as that increases the backlog and people's frustration. My constituents may be prepared to wait if they know that their case is being considered, but it is dreadful for their file to be lost or mislaid, so something must be done.

Mr. McNulty: Any loss of files is dreadful, I concede. It is frustrating not just for Members of Parliament but for the applicants, so we must address it. My hon. Friend will know that, together with UKvisas, we have arranged a range of activities, seminars and so on for Back Bench MPs on the range of IND business. Such matters are dealt with competently and fairly when they are brought to our attention, and hopefully we can deal far more swiftly with complaints from Members and their constituents.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): The Minister will be aware that one big reason for those delays and backlogs is the fact that immigration officers are trying to meet Government targets instead of doing their proper job. Last night, "Panorama" revealed that the Prime Minister's target of removing more failed asylum seekers than there are new applications took precedence over everything. One immigration officer said:

"We're going to focus purely on failed asylum seekers. Everything else must go out of the window."

Will the Minister admit that chasing a narrow target means that backlogs build up and dangerous criminals are let out on the streets, and that meeting the Prime Minister's target has become more important than running an efficient, firm and fair immigration system?

Mr. McNulty: I do not believe that that is the case. I freely accept that there has been a concentration on the tipping point target, not least as a result of pressure from the Opposition, the public and others, but it is absolutely not the case that that is to the exclusion of everything else that IND does. I do not dispute the fact that its work is sensitive, or that it is undertaken by dedicated members of staff. It is not advisable to traduce them, and I caution him against what might be termed fatuous casual empiricism.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of the case of Osama Obade Sattar—a nine-year-old Dundee boy stranded in Pakistan because he was refused permission to return to the UK on his mother's Pakistani passport. This morning, my office received a call from UKvisas advising that young Osama could apply for a Pakistani visa to allow him to return. Given that he was born in Dundee, he has lived there since his birth, and both his parents are British citizens, can we not find a better solution? What reassurances can my hon. Friend offer the understandably distressed Sattar family?

Mr. McNulty: Again, I cannot discuss a particular case at the Dispatch Box, but I am more than happy to meet my hon. Friend afterwards to look into the matter further.

Probation Service

6. Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): What steps he is taking to improve the monitoring of offenders by the probation service when released from prison on licence. [70210]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): In a statement to the House on 20 April this year, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) outlined a number of key proposals to improve the management of offenders on licence. Taken together, if the lesson is learned from recent reports, those proposals will result in greater protection for the public, particularly with regard to the supervision of the most dangerous offenders.

Stephen Hammond: I thank the Minister for that answer, but he must accept that Home Office funding cuts have meant that only 10 per cent. of potentially dangerous offenders are interviewed by the Parole Board. Surely the Home Office must accept some responsibility for that. Can he tell the House what he and his new colleagues will do to rectify that situation?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I can only reiterate the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about what we want to achieve—to get fairness into the system, but to make sure that public protection is paramount. My predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), put in place a number of measures. We will also consider the inspector's report on the probation service and report to the House when we are in a position to do so.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): May I first associate myself and my hon. Friends with the earlier remarks and the condolences expressed on the tragic death of Special Constable Nisha Patel-Nasri? Will the Minister confirm that the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of probation on the murder of Naomi Bryant by Anthony Rice identified flaws in the interpretation of the Human Rights Act 1998, rather than in the Act itself? Does he therefore agree that, rather than denigrating the Act as a whole, it would be wiser for the Prime Minister to agree with the Attorney-General, who said last week that the Act

"has been one of the great achievements of recent years and indeed of this Labour Government"?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Naomi Bryant case was outrageous, and our condolences go to the family members. I refer to what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said about the Human Rights Act and its interpretation and application. We will consider all those issues when we respond in due course.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I join others in welcoming the Minister and his new colleagues to the Home Office, and wish them greater success than their predecessors. The Minister will know that Home Office documents have revealed that an average of 7,846 criminals are arrested, cautioned or convicted while on probation every month, and that they are responsible for a total of 10,206 offences. He spoke a moment ago about public protection. Will he offer the House the assurance that we expect—namely, that he is interested in public protection, and that he will provide the necessary political leadership and engineer the proper strategic management? Without all those things, the rest is but words.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his welcome to me and to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the new team. Clearly, the problem has been going on for some time. That is why we introduced the National Offender Management Service and why we are looking into what needs to be done. I take very seriously the inspector's reports on recent cases. We will make sure that we are able to protect the public, which is our paramount priority. The status quo cannot continue and things must change. We are putting change in place.

Police Force Mergers

8. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many representations he has received (a) opposing and (b) supporting the merger of the Essex police force with the Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire police forces. [70212]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (John Reid): It is not possible to provide the statistics in the way that the hon. Gentleman has requested. However, we have received a range of submissions, many of them proposing a solution that differs from our original proposal. They will all form part of our continuous consideration.

Bob Russell: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that answer, but does he accept that there is very little support in Essex for merging Essex police with Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire police forces, two counties with which Essex has very little in common? What is more important—holding the line on a wrong decision made by his predecessor, or getting it right? Here is an opportunity to be a hero, rather than a villain.

John Reid: Hope springs eternal, Mr. Speaker.

This is not a decision that offers the choice of getting it right or pursuing the strategic objectives of my predecessor, which were based on considered evaluation by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. It is clear that the present strategic structure of our police services is not fit for purpose in many ways. Therefore, the status quo is not an option. The strategic goals outlined by HMIC, and the work that was done by my predecessor, point us in the right direction. I have not had time, to be honest, to consider these matters in the considerable detail that would be wished in the hon. Gentleman's area and in many other areas, because of other events over the past week. I will be turning my mind to how we achieve this strategic objective in the not too distant future. I hope to be able to return to the hon. Gentleman with fuller detail.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many of us in the area of the Bedfordshire police are concerned that whatever the reconfiguration between the counties, resources should be released into front-line policing? I welcome the extra 24 police officers that we have in Luton. Will my right hon. Friend ensure, as part of the reconfiguration, that Luton has parity with other similar police forces? That would mean that we would have an additional 60 to 70 police officers. Can my right hon. Friend assure us that reconfiguration will give us the extra resource that we need on our front line?

John Reid: I know that my hon. Friend is a doughty fighter for the interests of her own area. She will know that there are a considerable number of police officers on the beat and in the forces who were not there when the new Labour Government took office in 1997. There are about 13,000 more police officers. In addition, far more of them are on the beat than previously. Neighbourhood policing teams, as well as the back-ups from antisocial behaviour personnel and community wardens, and so on, mean that the capability of the police in combating crime and restoring order is far greater.

It is true that any restructuring will be aimed at further enhancing that capability. That is the intention. This will be costly, but we have already made it plain that although restructuring will be expensive we have undertaken to meet the net reasonable costs that arise as a direct result. At this early stage, I cannot speak with great authority about the position on the street in Luton. I undertake to educate myself on that in the not too distant future, and to write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I beg to differ with the response that the Home Secretary made to the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell). Essex is the size of a small European country and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat. It is not the function of Question Time to allow hon. Members to differ with Ministers. The purpose of Question Time is to put questions to Ministers. If the hon. Gentleman puts a question to the Minister, I can help him out.

Mr. Newmark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to know from the Home Secretary whether he will do what his predecessor agreed to do, which was to listen to the people of Essex, who voted unanimously for a no in keeping an Essex police force independent.

John Reid: Of course I will listen to the people of Essex, and to people throughout the country, along with their various representatives. That is what I have undertaken to do, as my predecessor did. He asked for people's views on these matters, and we shall consider them carefully. I have already said that we must take into account the individual parts of the whole and how the whole of our police service in England operates in its efficacy and capability. That may not always concur with the expressed wish of each of the individual components. However, we try to get the best overall capability that is possible. I think that the strategic direction that has already been set out is probably the right one in which to move and will lead to the right conclusions at which to arrive. I have already undertaken to listen, to read, to try to learn and to consider how we get there. When I have done that, I will return to the House and the hon. Gentleman will be able to question me.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): With a little more time in his new office my right hon. Friend will become aware that many in Bedfordshire, including me, have made strong representations in favour of a north-south merger with Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire and Cambridgeshire. Will my right hon. Friend reconsider that possibility, given that all the transport links and the natural geographical coherence means that Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire and Cambridgeshire work as a unit, as with the coastal counties, but possibly in two groups?

John Reid: Without claiming any particular credit, I can tell my hon. Friend that in the limited time that I have been in post, I have already become aware of that submission. As I said earlier, it is not possible to provide the statistics that the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) requested—perhaps fortunately—but I am aware that a lot of differing views have been expressed on this issue. Many of those views disagree with our proposals and most of them disagree with each other, so the wisdom of Solomon, elevated to an even greater extent, may be required. The HMIC report examined the current system and said that it was not fit for purpose; it is not serving the public as it should by giving the maximum protection. That said, I want to examine exactly how we reach our end goals.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Just today, the Prime Minister said:

"The Criminal Justice System is still the public service most distant from what...people want".

But the merger of police forces such as Bedford, Essex and Hertfordshire, which will cover an area of 2,500 sq m and a population of 3 million, will inevitably make chief constables more distant from the communities whom they are meant to serve. Will the Home Secretary look again at the federal option advanced by the Association of Police Authorities, which would achieve the objective of strengthening protective services without the loss of local accountability? Local people do not want to lose such accountability.

John Reid: On the suggested federal option, my understanding is that it has been tried before in several areas and has not worked particularly well.

Nick Herbert indicated dissent.

John Reid: That is my understanding, which is why HMIC did not adopt it as the preferred solution. So although I am prepared to consider every option, as a new Home Secretary, I would obviously not like to allow the hon. Gentleman to believe that I do not consider the strategic direction pointed out by HMIC to be the one that we should pursue. That said, I shall look in detail at how the matter might be dealt with. Secondly and incidentally, I do not believe that the strategic vision outlined in the HMIC recommendations is incompatible with more local accountability; the two elements could be combined. Thirdly, at the end of the day what people want is a more capable police service that reduces crime, fear and feelings of insecurity. They want a service that is seen better to protect, and to be fair to, the vast majority of people—who are decent, hard-working and responsible citizens—rather than a service that is unfairly balanced against their interests.

Police Force Mergers

9. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What steps are being taken to ensure that chief constables whose posts disappear with restructuring are given appropriate posts in new merged police forces. [70214]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Joan Ryan): There will be open competition for all chief constable and deputy chief constable posts. We are considering including in the amalgamation orders a provision enabling any chief constable not securing a post to transfer to the successor force for three months on their existing pay and conditions. A chief constable not securing a substantive post will be given a severance package.

Mr. Prentice: That is a disappointing reply. Why only a three-month period, and why are we saying to chief constables who were not successful in getting an appointment that people who are presumably at the height of their powers are going to be pensioned off? Will not this reorganisation, like every other one, cost an absolute arm and a leg, and might it fail to deliver the benefits that we are told to expect?

Joan Ryan: I thank my hon. Friend for making those points. I know that his own Lancashire and Cumbria force is very keen to see the merger go ahead. He will know that, in line with restructuring, the senior appointments processes are being developed through a joint police advisory board and police negotiating board working group, on which the Home Office's chief police officers staff association and the Association of Police Authorities sit. So it would be a little premature to outline to my hon. Friend the exact nature of the terms and conditions, but he can rest assured that they are being looked at in some detail with the very people who will be affected and their representative organisations. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary pointed out, this can be an expensive process; however, it is about creating police forces that can provide for our communities the protection that they both want and deserve.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I welcome the Minister and the Home Secretary to their new posts.

This set of mergers has been brought forward with intemperate haste, without proper consultation, in constituencies up and down the country. There is real danger to morale in the police force and, furthermore, to morale among the public, who will consider that they will have a much more remote police force and will not continue to have a local chief constable. Will the Minister please take more time over this?

Joan Ryan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his good wishes. I repeat to him what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said in response to a similar point—that he will consider all these matters. Our first priority must be to take account of the report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, "Closing the gap", which said, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, that the 43-force structure is not fit for purpose in protecting the public. Creating police forces that are fit for purpose must be our first priority.

HMP Chelmsford

10. Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): What the total maximum capacity is for prisoners at HMP Chelmsford; and how many prisoners are held there. [70215]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): As at 12 May 2006, the useable operational capacity—the total number of prisoners that an establishment can hold, taking into account control, security and the proper operation of the planned regime—of HMP Chelmsford was 575. The total population of HMP Chelmsford was 575.

Mr. Burns: Those figures are extremely encouraging, because they suggest that some of the gross overcrowding of the past has been stabilised and reduced. However, can the Minister tell me whether the work on the expansion of the prison has recommenced after its interruption? When does he expect that work to be completed? That will give the prison an extra 120 spaces, which will help to prevent overcrowding and help it to re-establish itself in future.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman will know that building costs increased above the original estimates and that, as he intimates, the project was temporarily suspended. It was determined to be value for money and is back online. The conversion of the old health care centre into offices is complete, and work on the new house block and visitor centre is well under way. That will provide the 120 extra spaces to which the hon. Gentleman alluded. The work is expected to be completed by late 2006.

Islamist Terrorism

11. Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): What steps he is taking to tackle Islamist terrorism; and if he will make a statement. [70216]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (John Reid): While effective security measures, intelligence and policing are necessary, ultimately international terrorism will be best countered by democratic values, discussion, persuasion and social solidarity. The key is to engage in genuine and sensitive dialogue with the Muslim communities and not to shy away from difficult issues. That process has already begun. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has a longstanding interest in the matter, and I would be happy to discuss the issues with him personally should he so wish.

Michael Gove: I thank the Secretary of State for his robust and balanced response and for his invitation, which I look forward to taking up. Last Thursday, my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace) asked him whether the suicide bomber, Mohammad Siddique Khan, had been under sustained surveillance before 7 July. The Secretary of State replied that at the time, his understanding was that there was not a sustained programme of surveillance. This weekend, The Sunday Times reported that MI5 had extensive transcripts of Mohammad Siddique Khan planning jihadist activities. It appears that the Secretary of State may have been misled by the security services. Can we have a guarantee that, in the absence of a full independent inquiry, every transcript and detail of the surveillance of all the suspects is passed to the Intelligence and Security Committee of this House?

John Reid: May I, through the hon. Gentleman's question, correct some of the misleading statements and misrepresentations in the weekend press? First, when I engaged with the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace) after the discussion in the Chamber, it was reported that I said that the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre was right and that I was wrong. In fact, I said the opposite, and there were at least five witnesses to the conversation. I said that I had been right in the Chamber when I said that there was no sustained surveillance of the two gentlemen in question, Khan and Tanweer, that they had been peripheral to another investigation, that the decision had been made because they were peripheral, and that it would be a wrong judgment to use resources and assets to pursue them rather than the main characters in the main conspiracy that was being pursued. That is the first point, and I stand by that.

My second point is that the Security Service gave the Intelligence and Security Committee full co-operation in its investigation of 7 July. Indeed, since the weekend, the Security Service has reviewed the evidence that it gave to the ISC in the light of recent press allegations. It remains confident that nothing that the service knew has been withheld from the Committee. I do not intend to go into specific details, for obvious reasons, but I am glad that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) has given me the opportunity to set the record right and to correct the misleading impressions that formed the basis not only of the right hon. Gentleman's comments but of the front page story, which was in several areas very misleading.

Mr. Shahid Malik (Dewsbury) (Lab): I commend the Government for their overall approach to dealing with terrorism. They are taking a twin-pronged approach, and the first prong involves robust anti-terror legislation, of which I have been a strong and vocal supporter. Mohammad Siddique Khan was one of my constituents.

The other prong involves dealing with causal factors. Over the weekend, research reports were published by the universities of Oxford, Warwick, Birmingham and Derby showing that there was disproportionate unemployment, underachievement and overcrowding in Muslim communities. Can the Home Secretary reassure me that the Government are not going to take their eye off the second prong of their approach to dealing with terrorism?

John Reid: I can absolutely guarantee that to my hon. Friend, and I commend him for the work that he has done in this area. I want to restate the view that I put forward at the beginning of this question, which is one that I have carried over from my other positions in the Government: we will not defeat terrorism by security forces, intelligence services and the armoury of weaponry that comprise the conventional forms of defence alone. They are a necessary but insufficient condition. Unless we address the underlying socio-economic problems, both domestically and internationally, we will not be successful. I therefore commit the Government to continuing in that direction. We have made a good start, but I believe that we have a long, long way to go. I look forward to working with my hon. Friend on this matter.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. One of the two British soldiers killed in a roadside bomb attack near Basra on Saturday was 19-year-old Adam Morris, a private in the 2nd Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment and a resident of Coalville in North-West Leicestershire. The thoughts of the House and of everyone in the local community will be with his family at this dreadful time. Mr. Speaker, have you had any intimation that the Secretary of State for Defence will make a statement on this matter, either today or tomorrow, to allow us to ask questions about it? The alternative means of obtaining that information—written questions and debates—represent a more protracted and less satisfactory process.

Mr. Speaker: The whole House appreciates what the hon. Gentleman has just said, and our hearts go out to the families of those soldiers. We appreciate the hard work that is done by every serviceman and woman in foreign lands. This is not a matter for me; it is a matter for the Minister concerned. However, the hon. Gentleman has put the matter on the record, and I thank him for that.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the Home Secretary's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove), he stated that, following a question that I posed to him on his statement last week about whether one of the London bombers had been under surveillance for months or years, I had misled the newspapers over the weekend. He said that he had confirmed to me afterwards, outside the Chamber, that the man was not under surveillance. My recollection of that meeting, outside the Chamber and in front of the Home Secretary's officials, was that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. Gentleman. I let Question Time run over for two minutes, and I will not let it run any further. He seems to be trying to extend it.

Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

3.35 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Pat McFadden): I beg to move,

That the Order of 9th February 2006 (Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill Programme)) be varied as follows:

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration and Third Reading shall be concluded in two days.

3. On consideration, proceedings on Government new clauses shall be taken on the first day and shall, so far as not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

4. All other proceedings on consideration shall be taken on the second day and shall, so far as not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on that day.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the second day.

This programme motion amends the previous programme motion, which was agreed on 9 February following the Bill's Second Reading. At the request of the Opposition, the Government have extended the time available for Report and Third Reading from one to two days. We are happy to agree to that, given the importance of the Bill and the amendments that have been tabled. As I and my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) begin our second week as Ministers, we look forward to a vigorous debate over the next two days.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I welcome the Parliamentary Secretary to his new responsibilities. He said that he looked forward to a vigorous debate. I suspect that he might have found exactly the right opportunity for one in this Bill.

I do not want to delay the House on the programme motion. We welcome the fact that we have two days, especially as the Government are in full retreat on this matter and have tabled a great number of new clauses and amendments.

In procedural terms, however, let me point out the disadvantage of paragraph 3 of the programme motion, which requires that all Government new clauses shall be considered and dealt with on the first day before the point of interruption. When so many Government new clauses and amendments have been tabled, that distorts debate on the Bill. In future, will business managers consider whether that might be an unnecessary requirement? If we have two days for debate, we should order business in the most appropriate way to ensure a full debate on all the matters before the House.

Question put and agreed to.

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 19

POWER TO REMOVE OR REDUCE BURDENS

'(1) A Minister of the Crown may by order under this section make any provision which he considers would serve the purpose in subsection (2).

(2) That purpose is removing or reducing any burden, or the overall burdens, resulting directly or indirectly for any person from any legislation.

(3) In this section "burden" means any of the following—

(a) a financial cost;

(b) an administrative inconvenience;

(c) an obstacle to efficiency, productivity or profitability; or

(d) a sanction, criminal or otherwise, for doing or not doing anything in the course of any activity.

(4) Provision may not be made under subsection (1) in relation to any burden which affects only a Minister of the Crown or government department, unless it affects the Minister or department in the exercise of a regulatory function.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (2), a financial cost or administrative inconvenience may result from the form of any legislation (for example, where the legislation is hard to understand).

(6) In this section "legislation" means any of the following or a provision of any of the following—

(a) a public general Act or local Act (whether passed before or after the commencement of this section), or

(b) any Order in Council, order, rules, regulations, scheme, warrant, byelaw or other subordinate instrument made at any time under an Act referred to in paragraph (a), but does not include any instrument which is, or is made under, Northern Ireland legislation.

(7) Subject to this Part, the provision that may be made under subsection (1) includes—

(a) provision conferring functions on any person (including functions of legislating or functions relating to the charging of fees),

(b) provision modifying the functions conferred on any person by any enactment,

(c) provision transferring, or providing for the transfer or delegation of, the functions conferred on any person by any enactment,

(d) provision abolishing a body or office established by or under an enactment, and provision made by amending or repealing any enactment.

(8) An order under this section may contain such consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provision (including provision made by amending or repealing any enactment or other provision) as the Minister making it considers appropriate.

(9) An order under this section may bind the Crown.

(10) An order under this section must be made in accordance with this Part.'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.37 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Pat McFadden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Amendment (a) to new clause 19, in line 2, after 'he', insert 'reasonably'.

Amendment (b) to new clause 19, in line 3, leave out second 'or' and insert 'and'.

Amendment (c) to new clause 19, in line 17, leave out from 'means' to end of line 23 and insert 'a public general Act'.

Amendment (d) to new clause 19, in line 28, leave out 'functions of legislating or'.

Amendment (e) to new clause 19, in line 36, at end insert—

'(7A) Provision made under subsection (7)(a) may only confer functions relating to the function of legislating to the extent permitted by section [Sub-delegated legislative functions].'.

Government new clause 22—Northern Ireland.

New clause 1—Restriction on powers under Part 1—

'A Minister may not make any provision by Order under Part 1 unless that provision would have the effect of—

(a) simplifying or modernising legislation,

(b) making the overall effect of legislation less onerous, or

(c) removing inconsistencies or anomalies in legislation.'.

New clause 4—Part 1 (limitation on burdens and costs)—

'(1) Save insofar as the Order relates to a person exercising a regulatory function, a Minister may not by order under Part 1 make provision which—

(a) makes more onerous any duty which may be owed by any person, or any obligation under which any person may be;

(b) imposes any duty or obligation on any person which is greater than any duty or obligation from which it relieves that person;

(c) results in increases in cost for any person; or

(d) creates any disbenefit for any person which is greater than any benefit to that person.'.

New clause 8—Section 12 (Limitation on Burdens and costs)—

'Each draft Order laid in accordance with section 12 shall contain a certificate made by the Minister to the effect that it does not make provision which—

(a) makes more onerous any duty which may be owed by any person, or any obligation under which any person may be;

(b) imposes any duty or obligation on any person which is greater than any duty or obligation from which it relieves that person;

(c) results in increases in cost for any person; or

(d) creates any disbenefit for any person which is greater than any benefit to that person.'.

New clause 9—Part 1 (impact on small business)—

'(1) An order under Part 1 must, where its application extends to small businesses, be for the purpose of—

(a) removing or reducing any burden,

(b) re-enacting provision having the effect of imposing any burden in cases where the burden is proportionate to the benefit expected to result,

(c) the removal of inconsistencies and anomalies.

(2) In this section, the meaning of "small business" is the same as in section 249 of the Companies Act 1985.

(3) In this Act "burden" includes—

(a) a restriction, requirement or condition, (including one requiring the payment of fees or preventing the incurring of expenditure) or any sanction (where criminal or otherwise) for failure to observe a restriction or to comply with a requirement or condition,

(b) any limit on the statutory powers of any person (including a limit preventing the charging of fees or the incurring of expenditure), and

(c) any matter which, in the opinion of a Minister of the Crown causes inconvenience or imposes cost.'.

New clause 17—Disapplication of European Communities Act 1972 (No. 2)—

'(1) An order made under Part 1 containing provision relating to Community treaties, Community instruments or Community obligations shall, notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972, be binding in any legal proceedings in the United Kingdom.

(2) In section 1 and this section—

"Community instruments" and "Community obligations" have the same meaning as in Part 2 of Schedule 1 to the European Communities Act 1972 (c. 68);

"Community treaties" has the same meaning as in section 1(2) of the European Communities Act 1972.'.

Government amendment No. 10

Amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 11 [Clause 1], leave out from "'legislation"' to end of line 3 on page 2 and insert—

'(a) means a provision of—

(i) any public general Act or local Act, or

(ii) any Order in Council, order, rules, regulations, scheme, warrant, byelaw or other subordinate instrument made under a public general Act or local Act,

(b) in relation to and notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972 (c. 68), includes provision made before the passing of this Act under Community treaties, Community instruments and Community obligations,'.

Amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 5 [Clause 1], at end insert—

'(3A) In this Part, "reforming" shall mean repealing, simplifying or clarifying or making different administrative arrangements for achieving its purposes.'.

Government amendments Nos. 11 and 12

Amendment No. 74, in page 2, line 36 [Clause 3], after 'he', insert 'reasonably'.

Government amendments Nos. 13 to 22, Nos. 24 to 26, Nos. 28 to 32 and Nos. 35 to 37.

Amendment No. 75, in page 6, line 24 [Clause 12], at end insert—

'(ba) explain why the Minister considers that the provision cannot be made by primary legislation;'.

Government amendments Nos. 38 and 39, Nos. 56 to 58 and Nos. 60 to 63

Amendment No. 78, in page 19, line 3 [Clause 34], leave out

'extending outside England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland'.

Government amendments Nos. 64 and 65

Mr. McFadden: I thank the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for his good wishes.

Let me begin by thanking my friend and predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), for his hard work in taking this Bill through its Second Reading and Committee stages. I know that it has been a great wrench for him to have to leave this Bill to take up his new post in the Department for Work and Pensions. [Laughter.]

Today, we are debating a series of important amendments to the Bill, which are in large part the Government's response to some of the criticisms raised and fears expressed about the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire made clear at earlier stages, the Government did not approach those issues with a closed mind. We said that we would listen, but we were also anxious to have a better regulation system, which could root out and change unnecessary or outdated burdens on business, the public sector, charities and the voluntary sector. We should not forget that this is the third time in 12 years that Parliament has legislated on these issues.

The amendments will rightly take us into some detail, but the wider need for the Bill could not be clearer. We operate in a more global and competitive world economic environment than has ever been the case in our history.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his interesting job. What measures will he want to bring forward for repeal or amendment under these clauses: His predecessor seemed to find it difficult to give us a list of examples? He can rest assured that Conservative Members are waiting for those and will support them.

Mr. McFadden: That, of course, will be a matter for the Departments once the powers are in place.

Huge changes have brought hundreds of millions, potentially billions, of people into world markets and the world trading system for the first time—for instance, the tearing down of the Berlin wall and the communications and technology revolution over the past 10 to 15 years.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I, too, welcome my near neighbour to his post and wish him well. He gave a perfectly reasonable answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), but could he not circulate a questionnaire to the Departments and return tomorrow with a shopping list from each one?

Mr. McFadden: I am not sure whether the Departments will have provided such lists by tomorrow, but I shall be giving examples of what we might do under the orders.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I join others in welcoming the Minister to his new position. He will know that each year the Department of Trade and Industry puts on its website a list of all the new amendments that it will make on two dates during that year. The latest item on the website shows that over the next year we shall see 40 pages of new regulations. Why will the Minister not commit himself to producing a list of the 40 pages that are to be scrapped?

Mr. McFadden: That is exactly what the Bill is about. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is a tendency for regulation to grow under Governments of both colours, which is precisely why we need a robust mechanism that can root out and remove unnecessary regulation.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I should like to make a little progress, but I will give way once more.

Mr. Turner: Along with the rest of the House, I congratulate the Minister. Can he tell us, though, whether an item of regulation on which the DTI is consulting at this moment—the deregulation, as the Department calls it, of Sunday trading at the behest of the big companies—would be eligible to proceed under the Bill?

Mr. McFadden: I do not think that it would, because of safeguards and other procedures in the Bill which we shall discuss in due course.

Opposition Members and I could, and perhaps will, exchange results of surveys showing how Britain is placed in various international economic leagues, but Labour Members, certainly, believe that it is well placed to succeed in the globalised economy. Employment is at record levels, reflecting the success of policies intended to secure employment opportunities for all. We have one of the highest rates of employment in the G7. We are a hard-working, enterprising and creative country. Our openness and flexibility are great strengths. The way forward is not to hide from the changes that are taking place in the world, or to wish them away; it is to ensure that we are best placed to succeed in this world by making certain that Britain remains a great country in which creativity, enterprise and hard work are allowed to flourish and to be rewarded.

It is sometimes said that this is a race to the bottom—a competition to level down standards and conditions of work. We reject that notion. We believe that people should be treated decently, that there should be a clean environment, and that there should be a labour market that ensures fairness. As I said earlier, however, we also know that under Governments of both parties regulations have tended to grow. We must have a process in Government to root out unnecessary regulation, and a remedy to hand that allows Government and Parliament to act when unnecessary burdens on businesses, charities and the voluntary sector have been identified.

It is precisely because the need for competitiveness is so important in the new and more open world in which we live that the Bill is necessary, and those outside the House look to us to keep our eye firmly on that bigger picture as we debate the legislation over the next two days.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend. As one who expressed concern about the measure because of its potential effects, may I say how pleased I am that his predecessor, and the Government generally, listened to and recognised the concerns expressed not just by Labour and Opposition Members, but by the Trades Union Congress and other bodies? While the Government did not intend to do any of the things that it was suggested they might do, other Governments could have, and I am very pleased that, as far as I can see, the Bill now contains the necessary safeguards.

Mr. McFadden: I thank my hon. Friend and parliamentary neighbour for those comments. I very much agree that the amendments that we are outlining today will show that the Bill is firmly focused on the better regulation purposes for which it is intended.

3.45 pm

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): Following the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), will the Minister direct us to where in the amended Bill it is made clear that those powers apply only to regulation and not in any way to general legislation? If that is not the case, there is a danger that the burden that will be removed is the burden on Government to put legislation to the scrutiny of the House.

Mr. McFadden: New clause 19 will outline the focus of the Bill on better regulation purposes.

Our subject matter is sensitive, because it is not just about what the Government of the day might want; it also takes us into the realm of the relationship between Government and Parliament, and Parliament's proper role in the scrutiny and approval of Government proposals in this sphere. In that respect, I thank the Chairs of the relevant Select Committees that produced reports on the Bill; they have contributed positively and constructively to the amendments.

The heart of what we are discussing is new clause 19 and the amendments related to it. Fears were raised that whatever my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire said, the Bill might be used not for the purposes of better regulation but to change fundamental rights and freedoms through secondary legislation.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I am glad that the Minister has reached the subject of new clause 19 at last. Does he agree that subsection (3) would still allow the Government to remove by secondary legislation the right to jury trial? Jury trial might be considered to impose "a financial cost" on employers or to be "an administrative inconvenience" to a number of different bodies.

Mr. McFadden: I do not believe that the Bill in any of its guises would allow the removal of the right to trial by jury, nor could it be used, if amended today, in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I warmly congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his well-deserved promotion, together with the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) and the Minister for the Cabinet Office, the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong) whom I wish well in her responsibilities.

Although this new clause allowing for the unscrambling of eggs that were wrongly scrambled might be an improvement, it does not remove the onus of responsibility on the Government in this field to consider moving towards sunset regulation, which would change the whole culture and ensure that bad regulation would have to come back to the House if it were to be renewed.

Mr. McFadden: We shall come to an amendment dealing with sunset clauses later in the debate. Perhaps it would be better to deal with the hon. Gentleman's point then, so at this stage I will say only that it would seem odd to legislate for a new regime of deregulatory powers to give people certainty and then to say that they were only temporary. We owe those who operate the orders a degree of certainty.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. This is very early in the debate and in his ministerial career, but I urge him not to fall into the trap that his predecessor fell into when discussing the Bill, which is simply to assert that something will not happen or that he could not conceive of it happening or that it is not the Government's intention for it to happen, rather than actually expressing in statutory form that it cannot happen. That is exactly the difficulty that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) pointed out; although the Minister may be absolutely convinced that he has no intention of using the Bill for an inappropriate cause, a future Government may, and that is why so many Members are concerned about it.

Mr. McFadden: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, but it is precisely because those fears were raised and those concerns were expressed that we have tabled the amendments.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McFadden: I should like to make a little progress.

New clause 19 makes it clear beyond doubt what the purpose of the Bill is and what the regulatory reform orders will be used for and, importantly, how they will affect Departments. Together with new clauses 20 and 21, those provisions make up the new order-making powers of part 1. New clause 19 provides a power to remove or reduce burdens that result from legislation, and it defines what is meant by burden.

Mr. Garnier: New clause 19(2) states what the purpose of the new clause is, and subsection (5) states:

"For the purposes of subsection (2), a financial cost or administrative inconvenience may result from the form of any legislation (for example, where the legislation is hard to understand)."

Which Acts of Parliament passed since 1997 would come into that category?

Mr. McFadden: The hon. and learned Gentleman's intervention was worth waiting for. What is meant by that is that there are processes whereby legislation is consolidated into an understandable form or a more accessible form, as I think he is aware.

John Bercow: Whatever the merits of the new clause, it does not appear to be comprehensive. May I therefore ask the hon. Gentleman a simple question? Will the provision of the new clause be subject to the negative procedure or to its affirmative counterpart?

Mr. McFadden: Orders issued under the new clause are dealt with later in the Bill, but the Minister would make a recommendation to the relevant Select Committee, which would be free to question whether the negative, affirmative or super-affirmative procedure should be used.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Will the Minister return to the question that was asked of him about whether new clause 19(3) includes the abolition of juries, for instance? One could argue that they present "a financial cost", "an administrative inconvenience" and "an obstacle to efficiency". What protects us from that?

Mr. McFadden: Clause 3 contains preconditions that stop the making of an order that would remove necessary protections or prevents anyone from continuing to exercise any right or freedom. That would be the response to the suggestion to do something as radical as removing trial by jury, which has been mentioned.

David Howarth: I thank the Minister for giving way again; he has been very generous with his time. The problem all along with clause 3 is that it is drafted in subjective form—what matters is what the Minister considers to be necessary, and the Minister might consider the abolition of jury trial to be necessary to achieve a ministerial objective. Will he give way on amendment No. 74, which would insert the word "reasonably" into clause 3, and therefore might go some way towards solving the problem?

Mr. McFadden: We will come to that amendment, but the Minister's initial judgment is not the beginning and end of the process. There are a series of safeguards, including the verdicts of Select Committees, the consultation that must take place and the other safeguards in the Bill, so no order will be based purely on the Minister's opinion, reasonable or otherwise.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I should like to make some progress; I have been generous in giving way.

Government new clause 22, Government amendments Nos. 10 to 12, 13 to 22, 24 to 26, 28, 29 to 32, 35 to 37, 38, 39, 56 to 58, 60 to 63, 64 and 65 are consequential on the new order-making power under new clause 19.

Mr. Clarke: If, as I gather, the Minister is moving on from new clause 19, which is the hub of the whole thing, I am very grateful to him for giving way. I have listened to him give way repeatedly. Although the new clause is well-intended, its terms are still amazingly broad. Am I right in believing, looking at subsection (3), that these powers could be used to abolish a tax, to relieve an interest group or trade from a burden of taxation, or to abolish a crime, to make something lawful that was previously unlawful under the criminal law? Those may be very desirable things, but they are subject to more safeguards than consultation and Select Committees. They should be subject to parliamentary debate before any such step is contemplated.

Mr. McFadden: The right hon. and learned Gentleman raised a number of issues. On tax, the Bill makes it clear that orders affecting taxation could not be raised in that way.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend; it has been quite a season. I wonder whether he is aware that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said on deregulation, in The Daily Telegraph in July 1999 that we kept trying, but we never succeeded.

Mr. McFadden: I was not aware of that, but I will let the statement speak for itself.

I will deal with new clauses 20 and 21 in more detail in due course, but let us explore new clause 19 further, because it provides a power to make provision in an order for the purpose of removing or reducing burdens—direct or indirect—that result from legislation. The definition of "burden" in new clause 19 would allow a Minister, by order, to remove or reduce burdens that take the form of a financial cost; an administrative inconvenience; an obstacle to efficiency, productivity or profitability; or a sanction, including criminal sanctions, for doing something or failing to do something in the course of an activity. That means that a Minister may propose by order to decriminalise offences or reduce or remove sanctions if they are no longer considered appropriate.

That definition of "burden" is deliberately broader than that in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. That is because the definition of "burden" in the 2001 Act has proved too narrow in that it allows the removal of only a requirement, condition or restriction. As a result, the concept of "burden" in the 2001 Act is complex and difficult to apply. It puts a heavy and sometimes disproportionate burden of legal analysis on Departments. For instance, the regulatory reform orders under the 2001 Act cannot clarify or simplify legislation unless in so doing a narrowly defined legal burden is removed, reduced, re-enacted or imposed.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): Does the Minister accept that a burden on one group in society may well be a freedom for another group? I do not understand how the interpretation of subsection (3) of the new clause would relate to, for instance, employment rights. From the point of view of the employer, which may be the state or a private company, employment rights are undoubtedly a burden on efficiency and productivity. According to my reading of the new clause, it would appear that employment rights could be removed by order of a Minister.

Mr. McFadden: There is, of course, the protection of necessary rights and freedoms, which is set out in the Bill. That would protect against the situation that my hon. Friend outlines. The new definition of "burden" will also allow us to target more effectively the order-making power on removing or reducing the burdens that businesses, charities and voluntary organisations wish to see removed.

Mr. Garnier: I listened carefully to the answer that the Minister gave to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) on taxation. Clauses 5 and 6 offer us some comfort. However, it is quite clear that, under clause 6, the Minister is not prevented from adding to the criminal statute book offences that attract a penalty of up to two years. There are plenty of offences that the criminal courts deal with now that carry a maximum penalty of up to two years. Is he telling us that the word "burden" does not encompass new criminal offences that a Minister might dream up that do not attract a penalty of more than two years?

Mr. McFadden: If the Select Committees thought that a Minister was proposing something that unnecessarily dealt with imprisonment of up two years, they could use their power of veto as protection against that.

Mr. Garnier: The great thing about Report is that one can have these to-ing and fro-ing debates. That is important and I am grateful to the Minister for entering into the debate in that spirit. This point is most important. We are dealing with primary legislation that gives a Minister huge powers to make legislation. If the Minister is telling me that I, as a representative of my constituents, will have to rely on some as yet unformed Select Committee to exercise its judgment in a way that would be helpful to me and my constituents, that is extremely worrying. He must surely be able to understand that the making of criminal law should be dealt with here, right the way through every stage.

Mr. McFadden: There are penalties in the 2001 Act, which, in some ways, reflect those in the proposals before us. Under the 20-odd regulatory reform orders that have been produced under that Act, I do not think that the kind of problems that the hon. and learned Gentleman is setting out have transpired.

Mr. Redwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: Not at the moment.

The types of better regulation initiatives that the order-making power will allow us to deliver include reducing the administrative burdens of regulation, consolidating and simplifying legislation to make it easier to understand and work with, and deregulation. It will also allow us to reduce administrative burdens, such as by simplifying administrative requirements for business when setting up a business or hiring staff, by ensuring that inspection is risk-based to reduce the burden on those who comply with regulation, thus concentrating inspection on those who do not, by simplifying and making more transparent and less onerous the way in which people and businesses need to apply for consent from public authorities, and by allowing, in certain key instances, the complete exemption of small businesses, charities and others from burdensome regulation to allow them to concentrate their effort where it is most needed.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The Minister probably knows what I have in mind already. The omission from, or black hole in, the Bill—and, indeed, his speech—is the lack of any attempt whatsoever to deal with the problem of the burdens on business that come from European legislation.

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Bill deals with us having a much clearer and more simple process of translating into British law some of our obligations from the EU. It does not somehow change our relationship with the EU on a policy basis so that we do not have such obligations, although I suspect that he wishes that it did. I am afraid that whatever I can offer the House today, I cannot offer the hon. Gentleman satisfaction on that point.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Of course, I do not have the advantage of being a lawyer, but I am rather worried about what the Minister has just said. Is he suggesting that if the Government of the day decide, those who run small businesses may be exempted from safety legislation that is available to those who work in larger companies?

Mr. McFadden: No, I am not suggesting that at all. If a measure that would do away with a necessary right or freedom was proposed, it would not be in line with clause 3 of the Bill, so I do not believe that such a thing could happen.

If I can move on to deal with the four definitions, it may help the House. On financial cost, an order may change legislation if its effect would be to remove or reduce a financial cost on an individual, business, voluntary organisation or charity. A Minister may thus propose an order that reduces or removes any unnecessary costs that result from legislation. That definition includes both direct and indirect costs, so an order may reduce both the costs incurred by a regulated business, charity or voluntary organisation and the costs that they pass on to their customers. For instance, the power could be used to deliver exemptions for small businesses from some disproportionately stringent audit requirements, which could have a marked effect on reducing their costs. It could also be used to deliver a proposal in the Charity Commission's simplification plan that would exempt small charities from certain audit and registration requirements altogether so that they could focus their resources on providing help to those whom they were set up to support.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Let me return to my previous point. The hon. Gentleman is giving a narrow illustration of what lifting a financial cost means, but I still cannot understand why the Bill would not allow a Minister to seek to repeal a tax by using the process. Let me be helpful to him. If, for example, a future Government wished to repeal the climate change levy, it seems to me that that could be done by statutory instrument so long as the Government ensured that they had a majority on the relevant Select Committees. I would hope that no Government would want to do that, but we do not want to legislate to enable a Government to do so. It is no good for the Minister to say that such a thing will not happen because that is what his predecessor kept saying. Will he point out the provisions in the Bill that would rule out any abolition of a tax by use of statutory instrument?

Mr. McFadden: Clause 5 states:

"Provision under section 2(1) may not impose or increase taxation."

[Interruption.] Bear with me. It is not possible to use the powers to create a new tax, but it will be possible to reduce a tax if it meets the procedures and safeguards. In practice, however, tax reform would be dealt with in either a Finance Bill or a tax law rewrite project, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows.

I wonder whether I can move on to administrative inconvenience.

John Bercow: No. I am terribly sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, but his answer to my right hon. and learned Friend will not do. The hon. Gentleman has just offered a normative statement; that this is the way it ought to be done, courtesy of a Finance Bill. I ask him again; what guarantee can he offer that that would not happen in the future and that the clause would never be used for the purpose to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred?

Mr. McFadden: If any Minister proposed to abolish taxes in the order-making power, he would have to consult the relevant stakeholders, and the Select Committees would have a say and a veto if necessary.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman illustrates why the Conservatives propose a deregulation Bill, which would put on the face of a Bill all the things that we wish to amend or deregulate, so that the House has the benefit of a proper debate. Those of us who want to deregulate also have worries of a constitutional nature. Why does not the Minister put on the face of this Bill all the things that we want to deregulate so that it is done properly?

Mr. McFadden: Precisely because we wish to allow Departments and Ministers the flexibility to propose deregulatory measures in a wide-ranging way. We have responded to some of the fears and criticisms by making what the Bill is to be focused on clearer. The right hon. Gentleman's suggestion would be too inflexible.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend to his post. He has made a considerable impact in Wolverhampton, and I am sure that he will do the same as a Minister.

I apologise because I have to leave the Chamber shortly to go to a meeting, but I suggest that my hon. Friend outline to the Opposition the background, which they do not seem to understand, to new clause 19 in terms of the safeguards that are built into the Bill. It is not a matter of a Minister simply putting some forward. My understanding is that if the Government amendments are successful, any proposal will have to go through two Select Committees. There may be a Government majority on those, but there is a Government majority in the House. That is the way in which the House works. Having voiced considerable concerns on Second Reading, I am now worried that there are so many safeguards that the Government have gone too far the other way. I urge him to keep an open mind and explain the safeguards.

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend and constituency neighbour makes a typically sensible point. I have referred several times to the safeguards in terms of a Minister making a proposal, his explanatory note for the proposal, the consultation required and, crucially, as he said, the consultation with the Select Committees and their power to reject a proposal.

Mark Fisher: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. McFadden: I want to make some progress, if my hon. Friend will allow me.

The definition of burden relating to administrative inconvenience will allow the Government to deliver reductions in administrative burdens on business that are being identified through the comprehensive administrative burden reduction project taking place in government. The final results and Government targets to reduce administrative burdens will be published in departmental simplification plans in due course. Where appropriate, the order-making power will allow the Government to deliver real savings in time and money for businesses, charities and voluntary organisations by, for instance, reducing form-filling requirements and making it easier to comply with regulations. Those reductions in administrative burden will free up time and money so that businesses can improve productivity and promote innovation.

The definition of burden as "administrative inconvenience" will also allow the Government to amend rules that are now considered unnecessary but, because they are enshrined in statute, can still bind companies and impose an administrative inconvenience. For instance, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has committed to taking forward a proposal, submitted via the better regulation portal on the internet, to amend the rules on selling game. I am sure that many Conservative Members will take an interest in that.

Under the Game Act 1831, anyone wishing to sell game from a shop must apply for a licence from the council and affix to the front of the shop a board stating so. Repealing those requirements will save businesses hundreds of thousands of pounds and relieve the administrative burden on them. That is a small measure, but it is the kind of thing that could relieve those affected of a substantial burden. As the rules are enshrined in primary legislation, only a Bill could repeal them. The order-making power in new clause 19 will provide a more proportionate measure for repeal.

I emphasise again that we also want to reduce administrative inconvenience for our public services and voluntary organisations. Reducing administrative inconvenience will, for example, allow teachers, who often raise this with all of us as MPs, to spend more time with pupils, and allow the NHS to concentrate more of its time on caring for patients.

As I said earlier, independent surveys have often found that the UK ranks highly in international comparisons of competitiveness, but in the face of global change no country can afford to be complacent. As Mr. John Cridland, the deputy director-general of the CBI stated in The Times in March, the Government must be able to deliver more and swifter deregulatory measures to ensure that the UK remains competitive.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): Although my constituents will no doubt be interested in my hon. Friend's example about game, may I take him a little closer to the real world in my constituency and ask him to confirm that administrative inconvenience cannot in any way be interpreted as something that would cover necessary protections? For example, record keeping under the Health and Safety at Work Act, etc. 1974 is unambiguously a necessary protection. Will he confirm that nobody could use the clause to interpret it as a burden?

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend, the Chairman of the Select Committee on Regulatory Reform, makes a very strong point and he is right to say that clause 3 talks of the provision not removing "any necessary protection" or "any right or freedom which that person might reasonably expect to continue to exercise."

Mark Fisher: While my hon. Friend is on the issue of barriers to productivity, will he return to the point made by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) about taxation and the climate change levy? Many companies see that levy as a barrier to productivity. In answering the right hon. and learned Gentleman, my hon. Friend referred to clause 5, which is about precluding taxation, but it precludes only the ability to impose or increase taxes. Why does it not include the ability to reduce or delete taxes? If it did so, it would meet the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point and ensure that such provisions could not be abused.

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend will have his opinion of whether that would count as a deregulatory measure, but we have an annual Budget and Finance Bill which set out the taxation proposals, and that is how we deal with such matters in this House.

Mr. Heald: Surely the Minister could just pray in aid the Labour record; it never abolishes taxes.

Mr. McFadden: I shall move on, as it would be churlish to mention VAT on fuel and the other taxes introduced by the hon. Gentleman's party.

An example of a measure to boost productivity is one that allows companies to patent a new technology that would encourage greater innovation in the economy. That is something in which the Department of Trade and Industry takes a great interest. We could remove obstacles to productivity by making it easier for someone to set up a company and by reducing bureaucracy and the number of forms that need to be filled in. The fourth limb of the definition of a burden involves a sanction, whether criminal or otherwise, and we wish to allow Ministers to propose by order to decriminalise offences or reduce or remove sanctions for regulatory offences. That has been carried over, as I said earlier, from the legal definition of "burden" in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. The Government believe that it should be possible to decriminalise or reduce sanctions on people who have not complied with regulatory obligations in cases in which targeted sanctions are no longer considered appropriate.

4.15 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is talking about burdens, but does he accept that the new clause would increase the overall burden? It might reduce the burden on 1,000 people while increasing the burden on 1 million.

Mr. McFadden: I do not believe that that is the case. Subsection (2) of the new clause states that the "purpose is removing or reducing any burden, or the overall burdens, resulting directly or indirectly for any person from any legislation."

The provision could not be used to increase the burden. However, the burden may increase for someone in the system, even if it is reduced overall.

Mr. Chope: In that case, will the Minister accept my amendment (b), which replaces "or" with "and", thus ensuring that the new clause cannot be used to increase the overall burden?

Mr. McFadden: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to speak to his amendment. However, new clause 19 emphasises the reduction in the overall burden and takes care of the issue.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD) rose—

Mr. McFadden: I should like to make some progress.

The definition of "burden" in new clause 19 provides the flexibility to supply the wide-ranging better regulation initiatives necessary to deliver the reform that businesses, the public sector and voluntary and charitable organisations want. The new clause focuses the order-making power in a different way from the 2001 Act, as it is output-focused and concentrates not on the way in which legislation should be reformed, but on the reasons for that reform. The order-making power in the 2001 Act concentrated more on the way in which legislation could be reformed. It removed legislative restrictions and so on but, after five years, that has proved limiting, and it has not provided the breadth of better regulation initiatives necessary to deliver the Government's better regulation agenda. It has not provided the scope of deregulation to which the main Opposition are committed, so useful regulatory reform orders could not be delivered. The change in emphasis will make it easier and quicker for Government Departments to introduce proposals to make a genuine difference to the regulatory and inspection burden.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): It is interesting to consider to whom the burden applies. There is a protection built into new clause 19, as the provision cannot apply only to a Government Minister or a Department. However, the caveat is limited by proposed subsection (4), which exempts Ministers and Departments that "exercise...a regulatory function". Can the Minister tell me where "regulatory function" is defined, or can he provide me with an assurance that that provision will not be misused?

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman anticipates the next part of my contribution. If he bears with me, I hope to provide him with reassurance.

New clause 19 has been drafted to prevent the inappropriate removal of orders that fall only on Ministers or Government Departments. In earlier proceedings, the fear was expressed that the order-making power could be used by Ministers suddenly to stop providing public services. The new clause provides that burdens falling only on Ministers or Government Departments can be removed, but only in so far as they are burdens that affect the Minister or Department in the exercise of a regulatory function. We believe this answers the fears expressed on those core public service points, although we did not believe that those fears would ever be realised through the operation of the Act. The new clause ensures that it will not be possible to make an order that stops the provision of public services because they may be considered a burden on Government.

Mr. Garnier: To some extent, what the Minister has just said is reassuring. However, public services are increasingly being farmed out to the private sector or the quasi-private sector. They are being off-loaded by Ministers so that they need not have responsibility for them. Would the Minister's comments bite on those extra-governmental organisations which provide a public service?

Mr. McFadden: The Department remains responsible for the regulatory function. I am interested to hear that the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to imply some criticism of flexibility in the provision of public services, to which his party is also committed. The new safeguard is substantial and ensures that an order can remove a burden falling on Government only where the Government themselves act as regulator.

David Howarth: On the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), the central question is what is meant by Government Department. How far does that go? Does it include quangos, private sector providers and anyone who might count, for the purposes of the Human Rights Act, as a public body, which would include bodies such as universities? The Minister should take the opportunity to explain to the House what is meant by the phrase.

Mr. McFadden: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue, perhaps I shall do that.

The Government have a number of regulatory functions—for example, the company law regulatory functions within the Department of Trade and Industry, and the pesticides directorate, which has regulatory functions in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The Government believe that these regulators, too, should conduct their business in a manner that is risk-based. For that reason, it should be possible to use an order, if necessary, for better regulation purposes to change an aspect of these Government regulatory functions, so that all regulators conduct their business in a way that is risk-based. Orders should be able, for instance, to move these Government functions into those of an independent regulator if it were more efficient to do so.

Two consequential amendments should be mentioned in this context. Of the many amendments before us, I draw the attention of the House to amendments Nos. 38 and 39, which ensure that any Minister laying an order to be made under new clause 19 must include in the explanatory document laid before Parliament, as appropriate, an assessment of the extent to which it would remove or reduce burdens as defined in new clause 19. So we have on the one hand the more focused order-making power, and on the other hand an explanatory memorandum from Ministers relating precisely to that power.

Two further consequential amendments on which I shall touch briefly are amendments Nos. 60 and 62, which relate to the definition of regulatory functions. Amendment No. 62 inserts the definition of regulatory functions, which was previously part of clause 24, in clause 32 instead. That is because it is now relevant to both part 1 and part 2, because of new clauses 19 and 20.

New clause 19 provides that an order may not remove or reduce burdens which affect only a Minister or Government Department unless, as I said, that is in the exercise of a regulatory function. New clause 20 provides that a Minister may, by order, make provision which he considers would secure that regulatory functions are exercised so as to comply with the five better regulation principles. We shall discuss that new clause in more detail later in our proceedings.

The focusing of the power in new clause 19 on the removal or reduction of burdens and the additional safeguard that has been added mean that we are confident that the clause creates the output-focused rationale for a legislative vehicle to deliver regulatory reform effectively.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister accepted amendment (b) in defining the scope of new clause 19. Without amendment (b), all overall burdens are not necessarily removed. Provisions can be restrictive in allowing just the removal of any burden. In the process of that door being opened by removal of any burden, that could overall provide more burdens on people.

Mr. McFadden: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I have not accepted amendment (b). We may discuss that further.

John Bercow: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. He has been incredibly generous and solicitous towards the House.

I am still concerned about the potential application of the new clause to the proper responsibilities of public services. Let me offer the Minister a scenario. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that there are responsibilities on, for example, national health service trusts under the terms of the Health and Social Care Act 2001, where they are considering changes in the provision of services to involve local people in and consult them on the proposed changes. Can the Minister assure me that nothing in the clause would ever allow such public agencies to argue for a removal or reduction of their public consultation responsibilities? On the face of it, the danger exists, at least under a less benign and progressive Minister than the hon. Gentleman, for precisely such an eventuality to occur.

Mr. McFadden: It is clear—it has been made clear in new clause 19—that only Ministers and Departments will be affected in terms of their exercise of a regulatory function. In these scenarios, which have been rehearsed throughout the passage of the Bill, it may always be possible to predict this and to predict that. If we go down that road, we will end up with a Bill that will be a beautiful parliamentary instrument in that it closes up every possible avenue to which the hon. Gentleman and others may draw attention. At the same time, it would not be an effective weapon in reducing deregulation.

That scenario has not been dreamed up by me. It is what has happened on two occasions when the House has tried to legislate on these matters. I ask hon. Members who raise these matters, which they have every right to do, to bear it in mind that business is watching our proceedings. Businesses, charities and the voluntary sector want an outcome at the end of this proposed legislation that will work. We must beware of continuing to amend, close off and hamper legislation so that it becomes, as I have said, a beautiful parliamentary instrument but not a useful deregulatory instrument.

I shall draw my remarks to a close by saying that new clause 19—

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I will give way one more time, and that is to the Chairman of the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Knight: Will the Minister confirm that he has said nothing to alter the fact that new clause 19, even with the restrictions in proposed subsection (3), would prevent a future Government from perhaps looking at the burdens on those involved in pest control and deciding to use that vehicle to remove, for example, the ban on fox hunting?

Mr. McFadden: I do not know how many hours, weeks and months the House spent discussing fox hunting. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that any Minister could propose a deregulation order that would sail through a Select Committee, he predicts a future House that I do not think will be in place. However, there is another point that has been raised in relation to the Bill, which relates to the extreme Government point, as we might wish to term it. What if these powers could be used by an extreme Government to destroy our freedoms? If we ever had an extreme Government in the United Kingdom, I do not think that at the top of our list of worries about what they might do would be regulatory reform orders.

They would be able to use primary legislation to pursue their ends—a point that I ask the House to bear in mind.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: No; I really do want to make progress.

New clause 19 and its associated amendments are a response to some of the fears and concerns that have been raised about the Bill. I hope that, in discussing them today, we have been able to assuage some of those fears. Those amendments give us a deregulatory power that is firmly focused on the better regulation aims that we want, and which the official Opposition say that they want, to achieve. They focus the Bill in such a way as to answer those fears and concerns, but they have not crossed the boundary that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) rightly warned us about crossing. I commend them to the House.

4.30 pm

Mr. Heald: We are grateful to the Minister for setting out the effect of these significant new clauses and amendments. We particularly welcome new clause 19, which is a major climbdown; combined with the other new clauses and amendments, it is definitely a step in the right direction. But as will become clear during our debate—you would expect this of any good Oliver, Mr. Speaker—we want more. [Interruption.] The Minister scoffs, but I thought it worth making the point.

The House will be aware that these new clauses and amendments would not have been necessary had the Government been prepared at the outset to listen to the widespread concern about, and criticisms of, their original proposal. I pay tribute to the Select Committees and their Chairmen, which have played an important role in the campaign, but also to those outside Parliament such as the TUC, the Institute of Directors, the press and other media, and various blogsites. This is an important victory for Parliament and parliamentary scrutiny.

Time and again in recent years, we have had to deal with badly drafted and ill-thought through legislation, or legislation that simply does not have the effect that the Government intend or claim. That was certainly the case with this Bill, which in its original form was dubbed by some of its fiercest critics an attack on parliamentary scrutiny, and even the "abolition of Parliament" Bill. It is good that a major concession has been made at this stage, rather than having to rely on their lordships in the other place to make all the running.

Of course, the Bill should have been about deregulation and reducing the burdens on British business, which have escalated under this Government. Perversely, it has turned out to be almost entirely constitutional in its impact. Deregulation was not mentioned at all, despite the fact that, as I pointed out on Second Reading, the British Chambers of Commerce estimates that the increase in regulatory burden has cost some £50 billion since 1997, that we are passing 15 regulations a day—50 per cent. up on the figure under the previous Government—and that during the same period, we have fallen from fourth to 13th in the league of the world's most competitive countries, according to the World Economic Forum. According to the International Institute for Management Development's "World Competitiveness Yearbook", we have fallen from ninth to 22nd, but whatever measure one looks at, it is clear that, after nine years of Labour, Britain is less competitive and moving in the wrong direction. The burden of regulation is one of the most consistent complaints that Members in all parts of the House hear when talking to business men and women, whether at national or local level.

Like all the business organisations that responded to the Government's consultation before the Bill was introduced, we were in favour of legislation that would make deregulation easier. I thank the BCC, the CBI, the IOD, the Forum of Private Business and the Federation of Small Businesses for all their help and support. They wanted proper safeguards to be included in the Bill, just like everyone else.

Mr. McFadden: I predicted that we would be trading surveys. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the World Bank survey of September '05 said that the United Kingdom was second in the European Union and ninth in the world as regards the country with the best business conditions?

Mr. Heald: The Minister says that he wants to trade surveys, but the problem is that our position is getting worse. All the surveys show that the trend is adverse—it is against Britain and against competitiveness, and that is what needs changing.

This really was a dreadful Bill, and we said from the outset that a range of changes needed to be made if it was to have any chance of making it on to the statute book. It needed to focus on deregulation, and it needed to have what I described as a veto. Luckily, Ministers are now prepared to consider that, although their proposals are still too restrictive. The Bill also needed to specify what kinds of laws cannot be dealt with using the order-making power. When first introduced, it said that a Minister could change any law in any way for any purpose. That was clearly unacceptable. Ministers are now moving to try to concentrate on deregulation and provide the veto. That is welcome. However, there remain some areas of concern that we will want to debate, not least the Law Commission proposals, where there seems to be very little to constrain what happens, and the veto, which seems to have been very tightly drawn.

[Mr. Heald]

When the concessions started to be made, I was quite amused by the way in which Ministers described what they were doing. The hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), who struggled through this long campaign and must be relieved to have moved on, said:

"The time has come for those who claim to want to tackle bureaucracy to stand up and be counted, and let the Government of the day get on with the crucial task of cutting unnecessary red tape."

The Minister, who is not in her place, said:

"I...stress the need now to get on with the task of removing barriers to productivity that will benefit hundreds of thousands of businesses, charities and public sector workers".

One begins to ask oneself where they have been for the past nine years as the Government have piled on the bureaucracy and the red tape, and which party has consistently argued for proper deregulatory measures during that time.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend agree that our proposal before the last election of having an annual deregulatory Bill to implement the necessary regulatory budgets Department by Department would be a much better way forward, because we would not only be able to debate all these matters in Parliament, but genuinely cut the burden?

Mr. Heald: Of course, my right hon. Friend has a proud record in this area. Let us not forget that it was the Conservatives who invented deregulation.

The Department for Trade and Industry has on its website a list of all the measures that are going to be taken on the two dates when regulations are laid. It amounts to about 40 pages of new regulations that are coming through. The Government spend a lot of time talking about the principle of one in, one out—for every new regulation, one will be scrapped—but does it ever happen? Does it heck. We see no list of regulations that are to be scrapped, just vague promises. It is time to change the culture in Whitehall to one that is about light regulation, deregulation and trying to take the burdens off the back of business.

New clause 19 may not be perfect, but it is a major step forward, and we certainly welcome that.

New clauses 1, 4 and 8 represent my attempt to focus the fast-track procedure solely on deregulation. The Government have gone far enough for me not to wish to press the new clauses. However, new clause 4 touches on a point made in amendment (b), tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). He was very active in Committee and was one of the original members of the deregulation taskforce, so he has strong credentials on deregulation. If he moves that amendment, I am likely to support him. My hon. Friend is seeking to establish that the net effect of an order made under new clause 19 should always be deregulatory. We believe that that is a sound principle, and that proposal is to be supported.

Amendment (a) to new clause 19 and amendment No. 74, tabled in the names of the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for Cambridge (David Howarth), would require Ministers to be reasonable in their considerations under new clause 19 and clause 3 respectively. I look forward to hearing the arguments for those amendments, which I suspect are implied in their wording. I certainly would not rule out supporting that approach. There is always a possibility of judicial review if a Minister acts in a totally unreasonable way, but the amendments could add a lesser sanction to the provisions that would provide a useful way of concentrating minds.

Mr. Winnick: I was quite critical of the Government's original proposals, and I am very pleased that these changes—the hon. Gentleman calls them concessions—have now been made, as I said to my hon. Friend the Minister earlier. I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman since he started speaking at the Dispatch Box. Is it the case that he does not agree—I will put it no more strongly than that—with his hon. Friends, whose various interventions on the Minister gave the impression that the Government would continue to have the powers that we do not want them to have, even theoretically? May I assume from what the hon. Gentleman is saying that he disagrees with his hon. Friends?

Mr. Heald: I would go so far as to say that the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Cambridge and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch would improve the drafting of new clause 19, and I am therefore supportive of their efforts. However, I cannot argue with the fact that new clause 19 represents a major climbdown and a step in the right direction. I personally feel that it has saved parliamentary accountability in an important area. I am still unhappy with certain other areas of the Bill, however. For example, it confers far too wide a power in saying that the Law Commission may make a recommendation on any matter—even a highly controversial and important one—without any guarantee that it will be debated on the Floor of the House. I do not accept that. Similarly, the terms of the veto that have been offered are inadequate. However, new clause 19 is a step in the right direction. I hope that that explains my view to the hon. Gentleman.

I also welcome amendments Nos. 23 and 26, which will tighten the way in which the Law Commission's recommendations are to be dealt with. I am still not satisfied with the overall arrangements for the Law Commission's recommendations, but I welcome that tightening. We would certainly be prepared to look at the whole Law Commission issue with the Government. Previously, the House has always dealt with Law Commission recommendations using the Standing Orders of the House. Standing Orders Nos. 58 and 59 apply a fast track to consolidation measures, for example. I am not sure that that is not a better way of tackling Law Commission measures than what is proposed in the Bill. Unless we can find a way of allowing non-controversial Law Commission recommendations to pass, while ensuing that controversial ones are properly debated, I shall be unhappy with new clause 21. That is just a warning, however, because we have not reached that new clause yet.

New clause 9 is an important proposal, and I look forward to hearing the Government's views on it when the Minister winds up the debate. We believe that it is necessary to consider the needs of small businesses separately when measures of deregulation are proposed.

There is already a plethora of examples of that happening, including exemptions in different categories involving businesses with fewer than five, 10 or 15 employees, and so on. Some exemptions apply when a business's rateable value is below a certain point, or when its turnover is lower than a certain amount. There is also a range of regulations providing different kinds of exemptions for small businesses.

When considering the regulatory regime for business, there is a strong case for requiring the appropriate Minister to consider whether the proposed regulation will be appropriate for small businesses. There is wide support for that requirement in the business community, even among large businesses. For example, the Institute of Directors believes that, on balance, there is a case for applying small firm exemptions. In its report on the subject, it said:

"The burden of regulations often has a disproportionate impact on SMEs because they lack both the resources and the staff to deal with them...Exemptions...should be determined on a case by case basis. Small businesses have flourished in the USA partly as a consequence of this approach."

What we are talking about is allowing Government the choice to impose a regulatory burden on big business, which might be appropriate, and to decide that it would not be appropriate for small business.

Andrew Miller: The hon. Gentleman is making a series of interesting points. On this point, however, will he give the House a few examples of precisely what he means?

Mr. Heald: I would be happy to do that. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Better Regulation Commission considered whether providing exemptions created disincentives to growth, but did not find much evidence of that. Its report, "Helping Small Firms Cope with Regulation", on exemptions and other approaches, made it clear that small firm exemptions were a useful tool to ensure that there was not an over-burdensome regime for those companies. I mentioned the various categories and thresholds that apply, and there are small business exemptions in 50 or 60 areas. At the moment, however, there is not a legal requirement that there comes a time when the small business impact is considered, although the Cabinet Office talks about that. I believe that there would be no harm in a specific provision that deals with small business, and I suggested such a provision in Committee. Interestingly, the Institute of Chartered Accountants has said that it believes that the relative proportion of the burden of regulation on small business is too large, and that it hopes that Ministers will consider such an approach.

Andrew Miller: I want to clarify this point, as the Regulatory Reform Committee, of which I am Chairman, must look to the future when there might be a less benign Government. Is the hon. Gentleman saying, on behalf of the official Opposition, that he would not include in those remarks measures such as the minimum wage and the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974?

Mr. Heald: All that I am saying is that, at a time when regulations are being made or removed, the role of the small company needs to be considered. I am going no further than that. As the hon. Gentleman will know, our policy is to accept the minimum wage. [Interruption.] Well, we accept the minimum wage, so he has not made a superb point.

New clause 17, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), seeks to ensure that where a fast-track deregulation order is made in connection with a provision concerning our EU obligations, it would be legally binding and effective. It is hard to disagree that that should be the position, and I believe that it probably is the position, but I would be interested to hear the Minister's views. The manner in which member states make their law is a matter for member states, and if Parliament decides to make law by order, that is for our Parliament rather than the EU.

The Government climbdown in new clause 19 is to be welcomed. There is a case for some amendment of it, about which we will hear in a moment, and we are open to considering that. I would like to hear the Minister's response to new clause 9, which is designed to help small business. At this stage, we are minded to support my hon. Friend the Member for Stone on new clause 17, which clarifies the law as regards the EU.

Andrew Miller: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that new clause 19 represents progress—indeed, substantial progress. To send a note of caution to my hon. Friends in the Cabinet Office, let me say that I was mightily pleased to receive a letter dated 11 May promoting me to the Privy Council, which I thought was a real step in the right direction, and then I saw that my name was spelt wrong.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): Long overdue!

Andrew Miller: I thank my hon. Friend.

My worry about the Bill is that there have been two steps forward and one step back. The new clause represents real progress, but this debate would have been unnecessary had the Government listened to my Committee's advice in the first place. The Committee said that the matter should have been dealt with by means of pre-legislative scrutiny, and a number of Ministers have told me privately that they agree with that. The House produced a device for the purpose of looking to the future, and we could have used it sensibly. After all, the underlying principles of the Bill do not divide the House; what we are arguing about are the detailed mechanisms involved.

I consider new clause 19 to be a substantial step in the right direction, and I urge the House to accept the principles that it embodies, but a number of points should be considered carefully. The Minister will deal with most of my concerns when he explains where the line will be drawn in the limitation of orders, but we shall not be able to get to grips with some other aspects until we examine the Standing Orders and determine how the RROs should properly be dealt with. We need to establish whether they will be dealt with through the existing Legislative and Regulatory Reform Committee, through a hybrid of some kind, or through a vehicle yet to be devised. We need to keep an eye on the ball. We also need to think ahead about how we will expect the House to empower the Committee or Committees involved to do the necessary work.

I agree with the thrust of the Minister's remarks, but what he should glean from the debate and his extensive and interesting weekend reading is the fact that, while the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 has not proved as effective as it might have, the blame lies not with the House but with Government Departments. I do not blame Ministers. There is an inertia in the system, with which any Member who has been in the House any length of time will have had to deal. Certainly two or three Conservative Members who have been Ministers in important Departments will take the point. It is extremely difficult to achieve momentum, however determined a Government may be.

On page 13 of my Committee's report, the First Special Report of Session 2005-06, we have published a chart. It is in microdot form, but there is a good deal of data that are worth examining. The worst example given is that of the Sugar Beet Research and Education Order 2003, which was dealt with by the predecessor Committee. I do not suppose that any Member present recalls what the order did—that does not constitute a challenge—but it spent 1,800 days floating around the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. That is extraordinary. I do not know the reason for that because no one ever explained it to the House, but therein lies the core problem that makes the Minister's job that much more difficult.

We worked hard—I say "we", because the Government generously consulted all four relevant Select Committees closely, and there has been dialogue with the Liaison Committee through the Father of the House, as well—to find a way through the difficult area of definition, and I hope that the methodology adopted proves to be right way. It is better than the alternatives that some of us floated, which included having omnibus lists of exclusions—I look at the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who had the biggest omnibus of the lot. I think that the mechanism adopted is the better one, but we need to be extremely precise and to make sure that it is clearly understood that we are discussing not burdens on Ministers, but burdens on people outside this place—burdens that the Minister has the power to do something about, for it is he, the Minister, who will bring an order before our Committee.

Under existing legislation, we spent a tortuous afternoon dealing with the most recent Forestry Commission order. We had to debate what the Forestry Commission was, in constitutional terms. Before that debate, I was not aware that the commission is a non-ministerial Government Department. That raised the interesting technical question: if it is a non-ministerial Department, which Minister introduced the order? However, just as the House accepts the Paymaster General introducing orders on behalf of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, we accept the structure that relates DEFRA Ministers to the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman is clear in stating the areas in which he does not want the power to be used, but are there any in which he would like it to be used? Does he have a list of measures that he would like to be removed?

Andrew Miller: Yes—I could list a number of items. I would like the House to consider giving my Committee or a successor body investigatory powers and the power to recommend to the Government areas in which they should act. The right hon. Gentleman has done private work in that respect on behalf of his Front Bench. Serious consideration should be given to whether, in future, my Committee or its successor should have investigatory powers, which it lacks under its current Standing Orders. In our everyday work, we all come across examples of regulation that cause us to ask why they are still on the statute book, or why they were put on to the statute book, whether by a Conservative or a Labour Administration. That matter should be examined in the context of the debate on the Standing Orders.

I congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), and his predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), on the sterling job they have done of getting us away from the rather odd debate in which the House found itself as a result of the Bill that emerged from Committee. Substantial progress has been made, although a few obstacles remain in the way of getting the legislation smoothly on to the statute book. I hope that during our proceedings today and tomorrow, Ministers will listen carefully to the serious points that are made, in particular by members of the four Select Committees, with a view to ensuring that the Government's replies do not preclude further amendments, should they be necessary. However, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary on adopting the imaginative approach that new clause 19 and the associated amendments reflect. I hope that the new clause will have the support of the House.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) said that the Bill that left Committee engendered an odd debate. I do not think the debate was remotely odd; it was entirely proper and necessary, because the loose wording that had been adopted drove a coach and horses through our proper parliamentary scrutiny, which is why so many of us were extremely concerned.

I again welcome the Minister to his new responsibilities. I am sorry that his first parliamentary outing is on one of the most controversial Bills of the year, although at least he has the advantage of introducing amendments that improve it rather than make it worse. He tried manfully to put as good a gloss on the process as possible, although he was not aided by the Minister for the Cabinet Office who left after 12 minutes, which I found surprising given the context of the Bill—but there we are.

The Minister said that the Government had listened to what had been said by the Committees that have considered the Bill. The Government may have been listening but they certainly did not give the impression that they were prepared to budge an inch in the Standing Committee, where the then Under-Secretary at the Cabinet Office simply replied with assertion after assertion after assertion that it was not his intention, and that if it was not his intention it could not possibly be anyone else's intention, to abuse the terms of the legislation, so it was all right.

The only thing that made the Government think again was the message from the Government Chief Whip in another place, who told them that the Bill was as good as dead unless it was substantially amended before it went there. That is why the Government have tabled the amendments that we are discussing today—rightly so, because the Bill is important. We all wanted to support it and to develop a consensus that enabled us to do so, but we can do that only if the Government remove the wholly unsatisfactory parts of the measure. However, I can tell the Minister that I wholeheartedly agree, without demur, with one of his amendments: No. 10, which leaves out clause 1. That is an extremely good amendment.

New clause 19 makes the situation better, but it is by no means the final article. It moves some way towards providing a limiting definition, but that definition is still open to misinterpretation and abuse. The problem with the original scope of the Bill was the huge width of interpretation that it allowed Ministers, and indeed a future House. In Committee, we argued that that could be dealt with in three ways: prescription, proscription or protections. All three are valid and more than one of them will be necessary to achieve a workable Bill.

In this case, the Government have adopted prescription. They have set out the matters that are the province of the Bill. They have said, by definition, what the Bill is intended for and thus, by implication, that there are other matters for which it is not intended and that are outside its scope.

Some hon. Members would argue strongly—my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) may well be one—that it would be better to have a proscriptive list of those statutes or aspects of statute that should fall outside the Bill's scope. Nevertheless, I welcome new clause 19 as at least a move in the right direction, but as the Minister knows, we and others have tabled amendments to new clause 19, and I ask him, rather than simply rejecting them out of hand, to look carefully at what they would do, because they would not work against the principles that he espouses. Indeed, they would support his view. Amendment (a) would introduce a single but very important word—"reasonably"—into new clause 19. That test of reasonableness would provide an objective, rather than subjective test of whether a Minister was doing what the Minister says would always be a Minister's intention in those circumstances.

Mr. Redwood: Is there anything that the Liberal Democrats would like to deregulate under the Bill? I always think of them as being very regulatory and bossy, rather than otherwise.

Mr. Heath: I cannot deal with the right hon. Gentleman's misconceptions about my party, but when he intervened earlier on the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), I thought that the reply was valuable. The Regulatory Reform Committee ought to have a wider brief than simply responding to what Ministers put to it. The hon. Gentleman suggested an investigatory role, but it could have a collating role. I should like that Committee to perform a genuinely deregulatory function in inviting suggestions for deregulation that ought to be put before the House in the form of an order.

I do not understand why such things must come from a Minister. The hon. Gentleman said that he excused Ministers from responsibility over what happens in their Department. I do not excuse them for a moment. They have the responsibility of making decisions in their Departments and, if they do not do that well enough, another Minister should be found. It is helpful to listen to the business world and the outside world generally about what deregulatory measures could properly be introduced.

I also think—this is partly an answer to the right hon. Gentleman—that the need for sunset clauses in legislation made by order is a prerequisite for good regulation. We should not have regulations that simply carry on, year after year, long after the original need has been removed but remain on the statute book, applying burdens to people in business that they could well do without. As one of the few Members who has run a small business, I know of what I speak, and I feel that that is a necessary protection for businesses.

Amendment (a) would apply the test of reasonableness to the decision that the Minister takes when determining whether he is acting in an appropriately deregulatory way. It is no good for Ministers to say, "We don't need the term 'reasonably'", because they use it in another part of the Bill—not, of course, applying to Ministers, but to members of the public who may wish to make a complaint about the way in which Ministers behave. Let us not argue about whether the word "reasonably" is otiose but simply consider whether it adds to Ministers' responsibilities, and I say that it does. I do not want to make a Minister's decision justiciable in that sense, because I do not want decisions of parliamentary procedure to become a matter for the courts, but I want Ministers to behave appropriately in making that decision, and the insertion of the word "reasonably" would have that effect.

The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) will speak to his amendment (b), but, as the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) said, it is self-evidently a necessary protection. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider it. He seemed to dismiss it earlier, but if he thinks about it further, he will realise that it is a sensible change that would not reduce the Bill's effectiveness but simply define it more accurately.

I do not propose to talk about amendments (d) and (e) today, for the simple reason that they also relate to new clause 15, which leads a group of amendments tomorrow, and I can explain the purpose for which they were tabled at that point. We have a slightly confused process. Nor do I need to dwell on amendment No. 4, which relates to the definition of reforming. The reformulation of the Bill means that we will have to return to that in another place. At the time when we tabled the amendment, it was crucial, but it is less crucial in the context of the Minister's new clauses.

[Mr. Heath]

Amendment No. 74 also inserts the word "reasonably", but this time in clause 3, which covers the preconditions that a Minister must apply. Again, I hope that a Minister would behave reasonably. He would be required to do so under administrative law because otherwise he would be subject to judicial review, but I do not want to be in the business of encouraging the judicial review of Ministers' decisions in terms of how they present matters before the House. That is not the right way of doing business. We should make it absolutely clear that we are not talking about an assertion—to use a term that I used earlier—by a Minister or a subjective view. A Minister should have to test objectively whether he is behaving reasonably when applying those preconditions and accepting whether they have been met. That seems sensible.

The last amendment that I wish to mention is amendment No. 78, which deals with something that has not been mentioned yet. It is a probing amendment on clause 34, which comes right at the end of the Bill and relates to its extent. When I asked the Minister's predecessor in Committee, he did not appear to have a clue why the clause was written in the way that it was. I do not want to cast aspersions on the previous Minister, but I can see why he had to be promoted, because he clearly did not understand this aspect of the Bill or many others. I want to know why the Bill asserts extraterritorial jurisdiction for itself. I am struggling to find the areas in which the orders that might be amended, repealed or replaced might apply outside England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Under what circumstances would that apply and under what circumstances would it be appropriate for the House to fast-track an amendment to legislation, which, for one reason or another, applied presumably to a Crown dependency? There are very rare occasions on which we have extraterritorial jurisdiction, for instance in relation to some sexual offences. I simply want the Minister to explain why he thinks that that has to be in the Bill. I did not get an explanation in Committee, so I hope that I will now.

I feel strongly about amendment (a), because it is the litmus test of whether Ministers are serious about rewriting the Bill. I hope to have the opportunity to test that in the House, given that the Bill has been completely rewritten. We are virtually back to the Committee stage with this part of the Bill, so I hope that we will have the opportunity to test the will of the House on that. I also hope that, unless the hon. Member for Christchurch gets a satisfactory answer, he will feel able to press amendment (b). If he does, we will support it.

I know that the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) will wish to speak on new clause 17. It is axiomatic that, if a matter is dealt with through this procedure in order for a deregulatory measure to go forward, it should not be overridden by the European Communities Act 1972 and provision elsewhere. If the principles of subsidiarity are to mean anything, they must mean that. I hope that the Minister will be able to reply that that is already the case, but I fear that he may not. If he does not, and the hon. Gentleman intends to press new clause 17, I will advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to support him.

Mark Fisher: The Government have got into a terrible mess with the Bill, so it is good to know that the new Minister in charge of it is doing his best to dig them out of it. When the Minister's predecessor presented the Bill, he did so as if it had a different title and was called simply the "Regulatory Reform Bill". I do not think that he mentioned the word "legislation" in his Second Reading speech. As hon. Members on both sides of the House have been frustrated by and tangled in the mess of regulation that has accumulated due to legislation over the years, the Bill was waved through on Second Reading—the House did not even divide. The Bill was totally misrepresented and thought of as uncontentious.

Mr. Redwood: If the hon. Gentleman checks the speeches, he will find that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen and I made it clear that the Bill was a constitutional outrage, but that we would not divide on it until Third Reading in the hope that the Government would see the error of their ways.

Mark Fisher: The criticism was muted. My perception of the Bill's history is that it was not until a few days after Second Reading, when the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) wrote a staunch article in The Guardian—[Hon. Members: "The Times."] I am so sorry. It was only when the hon. Gentleman dubbed the Bill the "Abolition of Parliament Bill" in his article that people started to recognise that it had many dangers and, indeed, the purpose suggested by its title: the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. It was seen that the Bill was extremely dangerous, so I am glad that many, although by no means all, the dangers associated with the legislative aspect of the Bill are being put right by new clause 19.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The hon. Gentleman really must read the Hansard report of the Second Reading debate. Both my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and I made it clear that we would under no circumstances accept the Bill in the form in which it was presented to the House.

Mark Fisher: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to his interpretation of his speech, but my interpretation of the debate was that the House took its eye off the legislative ball and waved through a Bill that was not in the interests of Parliament.

Andrew Miller: Unfortunately, I was not present on Second Reading because I was attending a funeral, as is recorded in Hansard. Does my hon. Friend recognise that the criticisms that he and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) have made about the Bill are set out in my Committee's report, which was published before the Second Reading debate?

Mark Fisher: I certainly do not want to fall out with my hon. Friend. However, the attention of the House was not focused on the acute dangers of the Bill. If the Bill had gone through in the form in which it was considered on Second Reading, it could, as the hon.

Member for Cambridge said, have taken away all the powers of Parliament, but the outrage that the House should have felt about that was not expressed. Hon. Members might say, with a certain amount of casuistry, "Oh, but I spotted it and gave warnings," but those warnings were muffled. In its original form, the Bill was a parliamentary disgrace, so it is good that the Minister has recognised that and is rowing us back from that disastrous position. Sadly, his predecessor did not fully appreciate how serious the situation was.

Mr. Heald rose—

Mark Fisher: I feel that the hon. Gentleman will be yet another person who will say, "Oh, but I understood the Bill only too well," but I will give way to him.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman should have been here on Second Reading, because many people, especially Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members, spoke out strongly against the Bill. They made it clear that we were considering an issue of constitutional importance and that changes would have to be made to the Bill. However, we did want a Bill on deregulation, and we are still fighting for that because, my goodness, this country needs one.

Mark Fisher: There is the problem. Everyone wanted a Bill on deregulation. What they were given was a Bill that went very much wider than that, and did so in dangerous ways. Everyone is now alert to those problems. I have to confess that I did not attend the debate on Second Reading.

Andrew Miller: Guilty as charged.

Mark Fisher: Absolutely. I am ashamed of myself. As someone who believes in, and who has based most of my career in the House on, the principle of defending Parliament against the Executive and defending the scrutiny of Parliament, I am thoroughly ashamed that I did not spot the dangers. Other hon. Members seem less keen to admit that they slipped up too. One of the few people who comes out of this at all well is the hon. Member for Cambridge, but others may wish to protect their reputations.

That is not the burden of my speech. Instead, it is the extent to which the Government are rowing back from that disastrous position with new clause 19. It is a good and serious attempt, but it is not quite right. It needs to be buttoned down in a solid way. The dangers inherent in the original Bill were enormous and complacency still exists, with hon. Members in some interventions saying, "I spotted it all." The original Bill gave powers to Ministers to subvert the process and bypass the whole of Parliament. The "abolition of Parliament" was not a loose phrase. We could have packed up and gone home with the removal of almost all our functions, yet neither the press nor the House was up in arms in the way that they should have been. I am delighted that the Government are rowing back with new clause 19, but it is not quite enough.

Pete Wishart: Does the hon. Gentleman have a view on why the Government introduced the Bill in the way that they did? Was it just a mistake by civil servants or something more sinister?

Mark Fisher: It is not for me to speculate on why and I am not sure that it is interesting now. Hon. Members, and there are plenty on both sides of the Chamber today, have been concerned about how the shift of power in politics has moved from Parliament to the Executive over recent years. Indeed, the former right hon. Member for Bexley and Old Sidcup, in his last speech on the Conservative Benches, said that it had been moving inexorably during the 50 years that he had been a Member of the House. Those of us in the group Parliament First, who are interested in such matters, recognise that the balance of power has shifted enormously. The Bill seemed to be the most dramatic and horrific example of that. Had it gone through unamended, it would have totally changed the balance and nature of our parliamentary system. Indeed, it would have neutered large parts of it.

New clause 19 is important because it is the one hand against that trend. I congratulate the Minister on introducing it and ensuring that the Bill has some constraint. In the light of the generous number of interventions that he took, I hope that he will go back and think about some of them, and see that there are still weaknesses. I do not feel that he responded fully to the point that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) made on the climate change levy. He deflected it by saying, "Ah, but legislation is covered by clause 5." However, it is only covered in one direction—to "impose or increase taxation." The right hon. and learned Gentleman suggested the possibility that orders could reduce or delete taxation. The Bill, with the current wording, does nothing to stop an order being made. It would have to go to a Select Committee, but a Select Committee of a different House, with a different Chair and a different balance could well wave it through. It could be persuaded that a climate change levy was a thoroughly malign thing. That would not be good for Parliament. It would be extremely bad for the way in which we conduct our business.

I suspect that the same is true of a future Government deleting the top rate of tax. That could happen and it could bypass the scrutiny of a Finance Bill. It is certainly true of the rather less important and frivolous example of fox hunting. I deplore the fact that the House has wasted 700 hours debating fox hunting. Anything more pointless and more to the shame of this House could hardly be imagined. Under this Bill, an order to delete all that legislation—if the order got through a Select Committee—would not need to go before the House; it could be a ministerial order. As a member of the middle way group who voted against the legislation, I would be happy and relaxed about that, but that is not the intention behind the Bill or the way in which we should conduct parliamentary business. I do not see anything in new clause 19(3), which defines the burdens, to prevent such things from happening. I know that the Minister intends that subsection (3) will preclude all those things, but that is not apparent from the wording. It would be very much simpler if the Bill were confined solely to regulation. Does the Minister want to intervene?

Mr. McFadden indicated dissent.

Mark Fisher: There was an air of expectancy that my hon. Friend was about to rise to his feet.

We still have a way to go to pin down and limit the effect of the Bill simply to tidying up and cleaning up the mess of regulation in our legislative system. We must by all means, either in this House or in another place, ensure that the Bill can in no way touch primary legislation, because that way lies perdition.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: May I begin as everybody else will begin by praising the policy intention behind the Bill? I very much doubt whether there is any right hon. or hon. Member, either present or elected to this House, who does not support the principle of deregulation. We all acknowledge the tremendous pressure that we are under to reverse the inexorable growth of regulation in recent years and the constant reminder we are given by British business about its damaging effects on our competitiveness, so this ought to be a non-controversial Bill. It is a minor miracle that the Government have succeeded in turning it into an extremely controversial piece of legislation. I agree with the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) that there is no point in going back now, but I cannot understand why the Government thought that they could carry general support for deregulation into support for a Bill of the kind that they first drafted.

New clause 19 is indeed extremely welcome. It is the first time that the Government have moved substantially from where they started. The original Bill was drafted in an extraordinary fashion; parliamentary procedure would have been bypassed on every kind of occasion if a Government were minded to do so. New clause 19 has sought to narrow that, but it still has not gone far enough. The Government are still not inclined to restrict their scope sufficiently to reassure me that there is not the danger, perhaps a few years hence, that the provision will be misused and in a way that would further erode the power of this Parliament to check the activities of the Executive. In the light of recent history, that is something of which we in this House should always be conscious.

The best point made by the new Minister, whom I welcome to his post and who did his best to get back to common sense on deregulation, was that there is a danger that we will all be so sensitive about parliamentary procedure that we will become extremely pedantic and Governments will again find that their deregulatory legislation is quite inadequate for anything except making such minor changes as to be of no consequence to anyone. I tell myself—and I hope that everybody else will in this debate—that one must guard against that before looking at new clause 19 and saying that it is not adequate. However, I have done that and I still think that whoever produced the new clause has been too cautious.

Proposed subsection (3) leaves open the possibility of the repeal of any kind of taxation in response to demands from pressure groups and commercial lobbies. Procedures made illegal by the criminal law could be legalised, and debate prevented by the fast-track procedure. I cited the example of the repeal of the climate change levy, because I thought that the proposal might attract the Minister's interest. Conservative Members support that repeal—presumably, he is not in favour of that—and there is nothing in the Bill to prevent the Government from introducing it. The Bill could be used to provide an exemption to value added tax on goods or services in response to a well publicised and financed commercial lobby. VAT has become nonsense because so many exemptions have been allowed over the years for political purposes. Plenty of people would argue that their goods or services are so desirable that an exemption is the obvious thing to provide. It would be easier to give way to them, if any Government are so minded, by using the legislation. Airport passenger tax, insurance duty and all kinds of unpopular measures could be repealed under the legislation, subject only to the consultation and the veto of the Select Committee on which the Minister relies as protections.

Mr. Cash: I am not sure that I intend to make an offer to my right hon. and learned Friend, but the very fact that VAT and other measures that he cited derive from European legislation means that they cannot be touched by the Bill. I may be able to elaborate more when I speak to new clause 17.

Mr. Clarke: Our debate has touched on new clause 17, but I cannot begin to understand it. Having heard reference to it, I look forward to my hon. Friend's explanation of what it is supposed to do. If it merely restates the existing or original law, I shall not be upset, but I do not think that it intends to do so. I believe that my hon. Friend is trying to insert a subtle provision to allow all our treaty obligations to be ignored, provided that procedures under the Bill are followed. That would encourage any Government of whom he wholly approved to make frequent use of the measure if they ever assumed office. However, let us wait for his explanation.

Turning to the criminal law, I have suggested that the procedure could be used to end the illegality of fox hunting. Most of the great liberal reforms abolishing criminal penalties have been introduced by the House, but some people advocate the introduction of things that they regard as liberal reforms. I do not approve of euthanasia or assisted suicide, but the criminal penalty on that act could be lifted under the Bill, subject only to the safeguards on which the Minister relies. He disappoints me by repeating the arguments deployed by his predecessor in response to such examples. He accepts that the Bill as drafted would allow anyone to repeal such penalties, but he says that the Government do not envisage doing so. He says that it is not realistic to expect anyone to do so in future.

Mr. McFadden rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to the Minister, as I do not think that that can be accepted as an adequate argument on the plain legal effects of a piece of the legislation that the Government have passed and which would give future Governments explicit powers.

Mr. McFadden: I am not asking the right hon. and learned Gentleman or any other Member to rely purely on my personal assurance in the case of the emotive examples that he has just cited. May I direct him to clause 3, which deals with the protections, rights and freedoms that would clearly be infringed by those examples? It is not my personal assurance that provides a guarantee against such measures being taken by a future Government—it is the Bill.

Mr. Clarke: I do not see—perhaps in the reply an attempt will be made to persuade me to see—that clause 3 answers my arguments on taxation or the criminal law in the slightest. Of course they could be put forward, and they would have the effect of lifting the criminal penalty from a particular category of people, or lifting the financial burden from another category of people, but it would be difficult to say that that automatically restricted the freedoms of others. It might deeply offend the sensibilities or the interests of others, but not their freedoms, so clause 3 is not an answer.

If the Minister wants to give a specific answer, let him deal with my example of taxation. I have not heard him yet explain why clause 5, which could deal with the point, could not be amended to include any reduction in taxation. If my point about changing taxation is so preposterous, why does the wording of the Bill leave it open to allow the change in the burden of taxation? Why does clause 5 not include reductions in taxation, so that lobbies cannot try and persuade a Government to use the power?

That goes back to a point that I made not on the Floor of the House, but in a private debate with the Minister's predecessor in the precincts of the Palace organised by the Hansard Society. There would never have been any difficulty with the Bill if all the things that Ministers have been prepared to say as assertions, promises and beliefs in principle had been incorporated into the text. If Governments are accepting various scenarios, why do they not bring them fully into the text?

I move on to the safeguards to which the Minister keeps coming back: all these things require consultation, and all would fail if the two Select Committees, or the relevant Select Committee, were prepared to exercise a veto. That is not good enough. That could be used to take away the powers of Parliament on practically every subject. If we could all be reassured by that, why on earth are we spending our time debating anything on the Floor of the House?

There are occasions when debate on the Floor of the House is needed, not always because the majority is opposed to some prospect, but to protect the rights of minorities as well. I have taken part in protracted debates on the Floor of the House where I have been in the large majority in the House. We have known that we would get our legislation and I have known that I would be voting on the winning side, but that does not mean that I thought it was an irritating waste of time to allow a powerful section of public opinion to voice its objections, to test the detail and to go through the arguments. That is the whole point of Parliament. It must never be regarded as just a nuisance that stands in the way of the parliamentary majority for the time being getting its way.

What about the protections about which we are told? I regret to say that I do not think that the veto by a Select Committee is good enough. The two Select Committees that have studied the Bill have done a very good job. Select Committees do a very good job in the House, but I would not rely upon them as the last defenders of parliamentary privilege and parliamentary process in every case. It is a fact that the Government determine the majority of every Select Committee. A Government determined to get their way, who are irritated by what they see as time-wasting and filibustering opposition, will ensure that Select Committees do not veto their legislation and get it back on to the Floor of the House.

Mr. Heald: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that to strengthen the Select Committees, an absolute veto is required, so that they can say, "We don't like the look of this order for this process"? A veto such as the one suggested, which we shall debate later and which is so hedged round with restrictions, does not give much confidence in the process.

Mr. Clarke: I agree entirely. I am glad to know that when we return to the matter, my hon. Friend will press those points strongly, because he is right.

In expressing my reservations still, in spite of the need for as flexible a deregulatory measure as possible, let me make it clear to the Minister that I do not fear that we will suddenly go to extreme government. I realise that some of the examples that have been cited by opponents, including the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) in his article, were fairly preposterous in the context of today's politicians. Those examples would never happen. We no longer need to argue whether the right to jury trial would be taken away. There are those in the Government who would like to take it away in a wide range of cases, but in the modern state that is today's Britain, they would never have dared to suggest that that should be done without any proper parliamentary process.

As I have said, I do not think that we are going straight away to extreme government. However, over 50 years we have seen a steady nibbling at the edges of the parliamentary process. Those of us who have been in this place for any length of time have seen a considerable nibble, almost always for the best of intentions in the mind of the Government of the time. I fear that for this Government, and perhaps for future Administrations for all I know, the pressure on the parliamentary timetable leads them to look for short cuts. I am not reassured by the Minister for the Cabinet Office—recently the Government Chief Whip—who is now in charge of the Bill. To get vast amounts of legislation through the House, the time made available for debate on any particular measure has been confined as never before.

We can hear the arguments already when the first of the proposed changes in legislation or in the criminal law comes up. We shall hear: "We have a mandate. We have just fought the election. The opinion polls are wholly in favour of what we propose. The people who are obstructing the process are unrepresentative. They are an irritating minority." Already, time and again, the Government keep making proposals, at present about the procedures of the upper House. Those proposals are designed to stop the time-wasting, the day-by-day discussion, which irritates the Government because it delays their ability to get their way. Secondly, it reduces the amount of legislation that they can introduce, and holds up other measures on Report.

Mr. Shepherd: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: I was about to resume my place. I shall give way briefly.

Mr. Shepherd: I am extremely grateful.

I think that my right hon. and learned Friend is being a little too sanguine about the nature of the House. We have experienced landslide Governments in recent years. The optimism and enthusiasm of an incoming Government with a large majority does not weigh with the proposition that my right hon. and learned Friend is raising. They are enthusiastic and determined.

Mr. Clarke: I agree.

The newly elected Member of the victorious party cannot understand why the entire process has to be gone through to deliver the brave new world that he or she has just been elected upon. It requires a few years in Opposition to have a civilising effect on any Member of this place.

John Bercow: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for giving way, and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) is absolutely right. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will accept that the Government are not justified in seeking to argue for new clause 19, at least in part, on the basis of what he describes as the pressures of the parliamentary timetable, as though they were some independent variable with which Ministers have to reckon. Does he accept that the pressures of the parliamentary timetable are substantially the result of the insatiable legislative appetite of the Government of the day?

Mr. Clarke: Yes. This place has turned into a legislative sausage machine, and the quality of legislation has declined as a result. That is partly because there is no proper time for parliamentary discussion.

Sir Robert Smith: Is there not an important lesson in a debate about deregulation and a debate about the effect of legislation on business? A failure to scrutinise legislation effectively in this place and an ability to rush legislation through are why business is facing such a burden of regulation.

Mr. Clarke: Yes. I agree entirely. That is plainly the case.

Mr. Heath: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will give way for one last time.

Mr. Heath: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is being very generous. I, too, must accuse him of being a little too sanguine. He said that the Government would never use a procedure for nibbling away at jury trials. They have used Order in Council procedure to do just that in the context of the Criminal Justice Act 2003. They have used Orders in Council to remove the requirement for prima facie evidence for extradition to the United States. That is precisely the way in which the Government work. That is usually on the pretext of fighting terrorism or rebalancing, whatever that might mean.

Mr. Clarke: I accept the rebuke. I was going to end by saying that although I do not think that we are going for extreme government—I do not think that we are likely rapidly to see unlikely things happen—we have seen some unlikely things happen. During the past three or four years I have seen processes on the Floor of the House that I would not have believed could take place had I been challenged 10 years ago to say that such things might happen. The Minister dealing with the Bill on anti-terrorist measures calmly announced on Report that he was abandoning its previous wording—that he was going to alter it all in the House of Lords. We spent the timetabled three hours—the entire Report stage—discussing the text of a letter that had accidentally been leaked, and which had given the House some inkling of what that Bill was eventually going to be like. That was, so far, the occasion on which the Government have most clearly demonstrated their extreme contempt for the processes of this House when political pressures are upon them.

Although such dangers might not be imminent on all fronts, they are very real. That is why, although what has been achieved so far is very welcome, it is most definitely not enough. I hope that the Government will accept some of the amendments being pressed on them today, and that this House and the other place will continue in their efforts to ensure that the wording eventually reflects the intention behind the Bill, and that it ties this Government down to that intention only.

5.45 pm

Mr. Redwood: It is a great pity that so far in this debate on this important new clause, we have had from Government Members and the Liberal Democrats not a single example of a deregulatory measure that could be deployed under this power, with the single exception of game licences. Although I am very happy to welcome that one, it is not going to change the world a great deal. One would have expected the Government, when constructing this legislation over many months, to have in mind many examples of how they wished to use this power—to be limited a bit under new clause 19—and why it was reasonable in the light of what they wish to do.

I want the Government to succeed at deregulation. It is a bit like suggesting that a tiger should become a vegetarian, but one lives in hope that the Government believe that deregulation is necessary and wish to do it. However, it would have been so much easier to have done it in the way that we proposed in a debate before the last election in this very House. We gave the Government 63 items for deregulation, including some very big ones, which were also given in writing to the Minister's predecessor. The Government said that a parliamentary debate somehow did not count as a way of expressing our views on this matter, so I followed it up with a letter to the Department, thereby enabling officials to see that list of items for themselves. We said that that list should form the content of a deregulation Bill.

The fact that we are yet again having a longish debate about the constitutional implications of this Bill, just as we did on Second Reading and in Committee, shows that it is not a very good way of achieving the desired objective. Given that the leading Opposition party is more in favour of deregulation than are the Government, if they had introduced a proper deregulation Bill full of good ideas, it would probably have gone through much more quickly than the constitutional outrage before us on Second Reading, or the rather more limited constitutional outrage before us today.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) is a Member whom I normally respect and praise. He is very good at defending the virtues of this House and its liberties, but he should have taken the precaution of attending Second Reading or reading the Hansard report of it. Had he done so, he would have realised that I and my hon. Friends the Members for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) and for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) made it very clear that the substantial and wide-ranging powers taken in the first draft of the Bill presented to this House were unacceptable. They allowed Ministers to regulate and legislate without going through the normal parliamentary processes. They enabled a major bypass of constitutional practice by effectively allowing primary legislation to be made by Ministers with very little reference to the House of Commons, in a regulatory, as well as deregulatory, direction.

We are now told that new clause 19 will limit these wide-ranging powers to legislating in a deregulatory direction. As someone who desperately wants more deregulation, I say one cheer for that. But as someone who strongly believes that Parliament has a right to debate all such matters properly, I share the concern of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and others that there are still too many powers inherent in new clause 19. It would still give Ministers wide-ranging powers to do things that would be better done in the open.

When I advised a former Government with a very large majority and a strong sense of political direction on privatisation, we had a choice. We could have said, "Let's take one piece of legislation to the House of Commons to give us an overall power to privatise anything we wish", and then do it by order-making, industry by industry; or we could have done it by primary legislation, industry by industry. I advised—I think that the Cabinet was of the same view anyway—that it should be done industry by industry with separate pieces of legislation in each case. That meant far more effort and difficulty for the Ministers concerned, but it was the right and democratic thing to do. As those major nationalisations had been put in place by separate pieces of legislation, industry by industry, we thought that they should be undone industry by industry, with much more lengthy and bruising debates in the House of Commons. It is extraordinary that the Government can still think it right, despite the change of heart represented by new clause 19, to propose deregulatory measures that take the form of removing pieces of primary legislation that have been passed by this House without going through the reverse process that would be expected.

Why should not we have not only an annual Finance Bill but an annual deregulation Bill? Indeed, the House might discuss and vote on the proposition that there should be a combined finance and deregulation Bill every year. It would be wonderful if the Treasury learned the habit of deregulation and legislated for its tax revenues in a deregulatory way instead of the very regulatory way that it does under this Government year after year, with hundreds of pages of new and complex provisions for old taxes as well as new ones. We could then have deregulatory budgets, Department by Department, so that each year a Department would know that there was a piece of legislation that it could use to fulfil the requirement to cut the regulatory burden it was imposing.

Alternatively, the Government could achieve their deregulatory aims by ensuring that each major departmental piece of legislation had an additional deregulatory section. We hoped that that was what the Prime Minister had in mind when he told us, in respect of regulations, that it would be a case of one in, one out. We hoped that each piece of regulating legislation would therefore contain a complementary deregulatory section so that we could be assured that the overall burden was not going up. But the Government never do that. They do not take advantage of the many legislative vehicles trundling through this House of Commons year after year, usually covering each of the main Departments in turn, by including them in their deregulatory ambitions. Today, we are again left with a truncated and guillotined debate on big changes in constitutional practice.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), I welcome new clause 19 compared with the original measure. I will not be churlish enough to vote against it, because it is moving in the right direction and I welcome it in preference to having nothing in its place. However, I urge the Government to think again about how serious they are about deregulation and whether there is a better way of achieving it than using the very considerable powers that the Bill will grant the Government if it goes through without further major amendment.

It is disturbing that we can have many long debates on deregulation without anything of a deregulatory nature being mentioned, apart from game licences, welcome though that is. Ministers still do not seem to understand that many colleagues on both sides of the House are very worried by this power for different reasons—not only those who fear that the Government may deregulate something that they think is good regulation, but those of us who are strongly in favour of far more deregulation than the Government have in mind but would like it to be done properly by the front door instead of improperly by the back door.

[Mr. Redwood]

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire and I find ourselves placed in a dilemma that is not of our choosing. We will not vote against new clause 19, but nor do we welcome this legislation. We welcome its intent, but we do not believe that the Government are really serious about it. If they were, they would by now have had their long lists of items that they were going to deregulate. We are left with the paradox that we may have a Bill that does not deregulate very much, but leaves on the statute book some worrying powers for future Ministers.

Andrew Miller: I shall not be so churlish as to ask the right hon. Gentleman why he did not do this as a Minister. Recommendation 2 of the report by my Committee, the Regulatory Reform Committee, states:

"We reaffirm the recommendation of our predecessor Committee that Departments should be assessed on their progress in removing unnecessary regulations and controls and not simply on their progress in simplifying matters."

Does he agree with that?

Mr. Redwood: I seem to remember that in the '80s the Government undertook a lot of deregulation and liberalisation that greatly benefited whole sectors of industry such as telecoms, in which I was privileged to be involved as Minister.

Yes, I do agree with the recommendation by the hon. Gentleman's Committee. I praise him for him for its work and for being one of the many voices that drew attention to the problems involved in the Bill.

Mr. Heald: I imagine that my right hon. Friend is aware that amendments that we tabled in Committee, and now new clause 2, would require a regular report on progress.

Mr. Redwood: I agree. Of course, it was a Conservative recommendation from before the last election that every Department should have a regulatory budget. Under Conservative control, those budgets would be reduced year after year across all Departments as a whole, and if one Department needed or wished to increase its regulatory burden, it would have to find other Departments that would take a proportionate cut so that the overall burden did not go up. One would need an annual deregulatory Bill to go through to implement that.

Mr. Shepherd: My right hon. Friend says that he will vote for new clause 19. Would it not be more cautious to say that that is dependent upon acceptance of the qualifying amendments (a), (b), (c) and (d), so that the vote is conditional? That is what I would urge on him and on my party.

Mr. Redwood: I, too, would like those amendments to be carried. However, I think that I said that it would be churlish to vote against new clause 19 and left open the position on how far we would get in amending it and whether we wanted to increase the Government's possible majority.

Finally, I turn to the amendments on the European issue tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). Nowadays, so much of our regulation comes from Brussels that we cannot exempt that from scrutiny and from our deregulatory urge. New clause 17 makes a good attempt to draw the House's attention to that and to make Ministers understand that they cannot have a deregulation policy worth anything, unless they are prepared to tackle quite a number of the regulatory burdens coming from Brussels. That would preferably be through renegotiation of those individual items, but it would be good to have a legislative back-up to make it crystal clear that if this House wishes to deregulate something, that should be law made here in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Cash: I am glad to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) in his remarks. I, too, have reservations about the principal objective of this Bill, which is to have a fast-track procedure for dealing with matters that is very far-reaching even with the changes proposed in new clause 19, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and other hon. Members have said. The fact is that this is a very invasive Bill. No doubt we shall wait to see what happens on Third Reading, when all our other debates have been concluded.

In an earlier intervention, I said that there was a vast omission—indeed, a black hole—in the proposal before us, which has been dressed up and presented as a deregulatory measure to reduce the burdens on business. That raises some practical questions. I am delighted to say that some six weeks ago, 50 of my right hon. and hon. Friends put their names to my amendments, which would ensure that we got the clarification in our own law that would enable us, where necessary and after appropriate negotiations—it would be done in a responsible and prudential fashion—to insist that we should deregulate on our own terms at Westminster and make it law in this country, binding on the judiciary and overriding the requirements of section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 in that regard. Having spoken to senior advisers in the House, I understand that this is the first time that an amendment of this significance has been selected for debate since 1972. There was an attempt, during the passage of the 1972 Act, to table an amendment that proposed that nothing in the Act should derogate from the sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament.

Some of us will recall the Single European Act that was passed in 1986. I tabled a similar amendment to that legislation. It was on the Order Paper, and my name remained in splendid isolation until I walked into the Lobby on the afternoon of the debate, where a certain very distinguished parliamentarian came up to me and said, in his inimitable fashion, "I think you will be interested to see that I have put my name to your amendment." Of course, it was none other than the right hon. Enoch Powell. He perfectly understood the object of the exercise.

Despite the best efforts of the European Scrutiny Committee and the European Standing Committees, the present volume of European legislation, and the fast-track procedures that are used to introduce that legislation into the House, are such that the accusations made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe about the reduction—and, some would say, the redaction—of our legislation within the procedures set out in our Standing Orders could easily be explained in terms of the European legislation that we have to accept under section 2 of the European Communities Act. That legislation receives scrutiny, but if anyone ever attempts to do anything about it by voting against a particular provision in a European Standing Committee, the House immediately reverses the decision. Many people, including me, regard those procedures as a waste of parliamentary opportunity.

David Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman think it wise that this country should breach the principle of the supremacy of Community law, which is what his amendment would appear to seek to achieve, by means of a statutory instrument and not of a Bill?

Mr. Cash: That would be a valid point, were it not for the fact that the only way in which it is possible to assert the legislative supremacy of this House is under, and by virtue of, primary legislation. The hon. Gentleman is a distinguished lawyer, and he probably anticipated my saying that. In my legal opinion, it would be impossible to seek to override section 2 of the European Communities Act merely by order. However, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the mechanism that I have employed in my new clause has been before parliamentary counsel and cleared for this purpose. It says and refers to any order repealing, amending or replacing other legislation that has been introduced under section 2 and is therefore binding on this Parliament only by virtue of the 1972 Act. We could not change that by order, but if the authority were given by primary legislation, using the words that would attract the legislative supremacy of the primary legislation that the Bill before us would then provide. At that point, the provision would have effect with regard to the fast-track procedure, notwithstanding my concerns about the fast-track procedure in principle, which will no doubt be resolved on Third Reading.

"notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972",

David Howarth: The hon. Gentleman has made my point for me. The only procedure available under the Bill is the statutory instrument, which does not receive sufficient parliamentary scrutiny. That is why many of us have objected to the Bill over the past few months. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to use a regulatory reform order, which would not receive sufficient scrutiny, to violate the principle of Community law supremacy. That would be an extraordinary thing to do, diplomatically.

Mr. Cash: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman added the word "diplomatically" Ultimately, this is a matter not only of grave constitutional importance but of political significance. I would say it was more political than diplomatic, but it is a matter of great importance, for all the reasons that I shall outline.

Mr. Redwood: The ill-judged intervention by the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who clearly does not understand the important point that my hon. Friend is making, shows that the Lib Dems are craven and slavish on European matters. They want our regulations to come from Brussels, and they do not want this House to be able to influence or change them.

Mr. Cash: I do not want to antagonise the Liberal Democrats too much. I am not in the business of laying traps for people, but the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said that he was minded to support my new clause, and I hope that he will stand good on that when we go into the Lobby.

Important questions arise that are not merely of an abstract nature. The House has a long history in this regard. Those who have studied constitutional law will remember Henry VIII and the Statute of Proclamations, the great Edward Coke, the achievement of the legislative supremacy of Parliament in 1688, following the final denouement of the Stuarts' attempts to insist on the divine right of kings at the expense of the people of this country, and the assertion in the Bill of Rights in that year that decisions would be made by Parliament and not by the monarchy. Those issues are not dissimilar to the questions that arise in the context of the European Communities Act 1972.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose—

Mr. Cash: I thought that that might get a rise out of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not suggest that any of those great measures should be set aside by statutory instrument, subject to the veto of two Select Committees. He is helping the arguments of those who think that the Government have not gone far enough. The Government say that no politician would conceive of abolishing a tax or a criminal offence by statutory instrument, yet my hon. Friend is advocating the repudiation of our treaty obligations—and, effectively, our leaving the European Union—by a parliamentary process that would allow those of us who are pro-European merely the opportunity to object to a statutory instrument, or to get a Select Committee to block it.

Mr. Cash: I am delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend has now entered into the debate with gusto. I had hoped that I might be called to speak before him, so that he could have engaged in a series of interventions on me. I am afraid that the issues that he raises do not add up.

Since 1972, we have been subjected to a constant stream of legislation that has been brought in by prerogative. Let us take the Maastricht treaty as an example, or the treaties of Nice or Amsterdam. I do not need to weary the House with the vast amount of legislation of that kind that has gone through this

[Mr. Cash]

House, actively encouraged by my right hon. and learned Friend. Much of it has been resisted by popular sentiment, even though not everyone has understood every jot and tittle of it. My right hon. and learned Friend himself said that he found it difficult, to use the words of new clause 19,

"for example, where the legislation is hard to understand".

With regard to the population at large, the same applies to much of the European legislation, which is regularly visited on them by virtue of the extremely truncated, undemocratic and unaccountable methods employed through the European treaties and the mechanisms of the House. Ultimately, those lead to legislation going through effectively because we are told that the European Communities Act is inviolable, cannot be touched and is in concrete, that there is an acquis communautaire, that we should forget about any changes, and that the constant stream of European integration must therefore continue. Well, I have news for my right hon. and learned Friend—this is a moment when we say no.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Is not my hon. Friend being a little incautious in his advocacy of this altogether welcome new clause? The manner in which he is proposing it and dealing with interventions not only from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) but from the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) is widening the gulf between those who are in favour of the new clause and those who are against it, rather than bringing together those who have some concerns with those who are in favour of the new clause. When the hon. Member for Cambridge says that the supposed supremacy of European law is being set aside by a mere order, it is not an order that is doing that but this new clause. My hon. Friend was wrong to agree with the hon. Member for Cambridge on that.

Mr. Cash: With respect, my hon. Friend might consider that matter again. The mechanism to enable the constitutional procedure to have the effect that I desire is contained in the new clause. I think that the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) understood that. We need the backing of primary legislation, using the magic words, and then referring to the fact that it shall be binding in legal proceedings in the United Kingdom. That provides the mechanism whereby the judiciary are under a duty to give effect to that latest Act of Parliament.

"notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972",

Before I move on to the question whether legislative supremacy is a principle to which we still adhere, I want to deal first with why, from a practical point of view, I regard it as extremely important that we understand how invasive the burdens have been in relation to the business community, industry, competitiveness and enterprise. Leaving aside the system that I have employed to achieve my results, that is my main point. For example, a short time ago, the British Chambers of Commerce produced figures showing the accumulated cost of burdens that arose in respect of a number of regulations. It did not, however, demonstrate that the top six—the most burdensome and most costly ones—were all of European origin, of which I could give several examples. The total cost, from the moment that the burdens were introduced to the moment that the figures were published, came to £25 billion. The regulations concerned included the working time regulations, the Data Protection Act 1998, the Employment Act 2002 and so on.

In addition, Sir David Arculus, the Government-appointed chairman of the Better Regulation Task Force, estimated the cost to business of over-burdensome regulations—I stand to be corrected, as the figure seems extraordinarily high, but it is the one that he gave, as far as I can recollect—as £100 billion. No wonder the Government are looking for a way to deal with the problem. We can break down the European element of that, but we should also consider the percentage of legislation passed through the truncated, unaccountable, unattractive and undemocratic procedures in the House, which impose those expensive regulations on British business. Those regulations are then in concrete, and we can do nothing about them, whatever their merits. Once such regulations have been passed by a qualified majority vote, the legislation is imposed on us, and other member states might have a vested interest in not making changes that may be required.

I take seriously the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner). However, I do not want or intend to over-egg the pudding on this point. For me, this is essentially a practical question about the burdens on business and deregulation. It is not a foray into the abstractions of sovereignty; it is about the way in which the system works. It is a time check on reality. Are we going to allow this legislation to continue to invade our business community? The House should remember that I have always said that I am in favour of trade and political co-operation, and I voted for the Single European Act, notwithstanding my attempt to preserve the sovereignty of the United Kingdom, for that reason. I wrote an article in The Times for that purpose at the time. I foresaw that we might find ourselves saturated in unnecessary burdens and that we would need to relieve them in the interests of competition. It was therefore essential to have the mechanism to enable us to do that. Unfortunately, under the rules of the supremacy of Community law—the other law, in the parallel universe that exists in legislation—we are not allowed to have that mechanism, under the terms of the case law of the European Union. The hon. Member for Cambridge and I could go through all the case law, and I would agree with him that the position is clear under Community law.

However, all that case law, every one of those burdens and every aspect of that European legislation depend on one thing only—the legislative supremacy of this House in passing the European Communities Act. As a consequence, it is open to our judiciary—as in the different context of the Human Rights Act 1998—to interpret and apply that law. That is solely, exclusively and entirely because of the European Communities Act passed by this House. If this House decides that it wishes to make changes, by whatever procedure, it is incumbent on the judiciary to give effect to that subsequent inconsistent law, provided it is express and unambiguous. That case law is laid down unequivocally by Lord Denning in the case of McCarthy's v. Smith, by Lord Justice Laws in the case of the metric martyrs and by Lord Steyn himself in a lecture in 1996.

There are so many misunderstandings about the role of the judiciary in these matters. So much confusion is created by invoking the principles of Community law when we are dealing with, and must continue to insist on, the principles of United Kingdom constitutional law. From the earliest days of the 17th century, in a constant movement towards the establishment of the democratic Parliament that we have today, that has been dependent on the fact that we legislate and the judges obey. I do not mean that in a derogatory sense; it is what the judges say of their own function.

I mentioned Lord Steyn. He is well known as a distinguished lawyer, with—I would say—some influence, and with strong views about the European Community. We understand that he is enthusiastic about it. In a lecture that he gave in 1996, however, he made his opinion abundantly clear. He said

"in countless decisions the courts have declared the unqualified supremacy of Parliament. There are no exceptions."

Mr. Heath: It is always worth listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. I agree entirely with his point about legislative supremacy in the context of the European Communities Act 1972, and, as he knows, I agree largely with what he says about the proper application of subsidiarity and excessive regulation. However, he has posed a conundrum to both the Liberal Democrats and his own Front Benchers, who in Committee supported new clause 7, which excluded the European Communities Act from consideration of the procedural device that the Government propose. We agreed that it was not a matter that should undergo the fast-track procedure. Now the hon. Gentleman is inviting us to place it squarely and centrally in the fast-track procedure. As I think he will recognise, that poses a great difficulty both to us and to the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald).

Mr. Cash: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but what I am trying to do is to invoke T.S. Eliot's famous observation that humankind finds it very difficult to deal with reality.

Mr. Heald: I think my hon. Friend will agree that using the order-making power to amend the European Communities Act 1972 might be a bit strong, even for him. Is not his point that, if a procedure allows us to change the law in this country and if there is a principle of sovereignty, it is open to our Parliament to use that procedure to change laws that affect our European Union treaty obligations? Of course, whether that is a good idea is a different question, and it is possible that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and I would not make the same judgment as my hon. Friend. In terms of the sovereignty of Parliament, though, it must be right for us to be able to change laws that break EU treaty obligations. It is just that it is probably not a very good idea.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend has put the case well from his point of view. Looking at the complexion of this Government, I should not have thought that there was a cat in hell's chance of their using the fast-track procedure in any way to affect the European legislation, but the case that I have made in respect of the burden on business is unanswerable, as is my observation that it is not included in the package. I do not expect the Government to take it up, but my hon. Friend is right to point out that if we are to be correct and accurate in regard to our constitutional position in UK law, and in the context of the legislative supremacy of Parliament, it is incumbent on us to recognise the issues and to recognise that, through a process of absorption, osmosis and camouflage, they have been overtaken. People have come to believe that everything is set in concrete. It is not, and that is part of the point of my new clause.

Mr. Shepherd: My hon. Friend is right, especially in one respect. The new clause demonstrates clearly to those who are persuaded by the reasons given for membership of the European Communities that they can be changed and irrevocably broken by a statutory instrument. That is what is wrong with the Bill.

Mr. Cash: Indeed. It is undesirable that fast-track procedures should be regarded as the best way to go about things—we have been through the argument already, and we may well vote against that proposal on Third Reading—but it is important to establish and reassert a principle. We have not had many opportunities to do that in the context of a substantive Government Bill to which amendments can be tabled for purposes of clarity.

Let me say this to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, a distinguished chairman of the Conservative party's democracy commission. It would not be good enough to assert—if he were to do so—that what I propose is not possible through the legislative supremacy of the House of Commons. He cannot avoid the fact that what I am saying is good constitutional law of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend is a long-standing opponent of section 2, in particular, of the European Communities Act. Surely it is open to any Government to introduce legislation to repeal that section, if they so wish. My hon. Friend and I would disagree on the desirability of such a measure, but a proper way of dealing with the issue would be to present primary legislation—which, I would hope, would be debated at the same length as the original legislation—on the Floor of the House of Commons. My hon. Friend is a great parliamentarian, and I cannot understand why he of all people should suggest that no more than the Bill and a statutory instrument should be employed to enact a drastic measure on which he and I will not reach speedy agreement.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. and learned Friend has made a political point. I have listened to what he has said, as I have on many other occasions.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): For the avoidance of doubt, will my hon. Friend confirm that new clause 17 could not be used to amend or repeal the 1972 Act, but could be used to make explicit that Parliament can change statutes notwithstanding the provisions of the Act? That is a rather unexceptional constitutional convention under which we all live. My hon. Friend's new clause is thus a modest measure that will certainly not lead to the vast constitutional revolution posited by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend has put it very well. The principle embodied in new clause 17 is the vital principle of preserving and reasserting, and the Bill has given me the opportunity to do that. Notwithstanding the concerns of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, which are primarily political, and those of the hon. Member for Cambridge, which appear to be primarily diplomatic, I insist on my point.

David Howarth rose—

Mr. Cash: I see that the hon. Gentleman wishes to intrude again.

David Howarth: I merely wish to ask the hon. Gentleman what aspect of new clause 19 would prevent the repeal of the 1972 Act.

Mr. Cash: The answer is simple. Without primary legislation, which new clause 17 would constitute—

David Howarth: I was talking about new clause 19.

Mr. Cash: I am referring to new clause 17. If it were incorporated in the Bill, it would confer authority—on the basis of principles that I need not repeat—enabling the legislation to have the effect that I want: that is, where necessary to override the 1972 Act to reduce the burdens on business. I think that that point is well catered for.

Edward Miliband: I hesitate to intervene in this debate among what one might call the European trainspotters, but if I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, if the new clause were to be inserted, we would be able to override the principles of the 1972 Act. What does he think would follow in terms of our relationship with the European Union?

6.30 pm

Mr. Cash: Predictably, there would be enforcement proceedings, infraction proceedings and various other actions. Until very recently, my party had precisely such a policy in respect of the common fisheries policy, except that we had not spelled out the legal mechanism for doing that. We are perfectly happy to accept that, where matters of vital national interest are concerned, Europe does not necessarily get it right. In fact, the low growth and high unemployment, the riots in France, the problems implementing economic reforms that Angela Merkel is experiencing, the difficulties that Mr. de Villepin experienced, and so on—the list is endless—are all indications of the fact that the Lisbon agenda does not work—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. This is a wide-ranging debate, but the hon. Gentleman is starting to range rather too wide.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I give way to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love).

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I am forced to intervene in the hon. Gentleman's long oration. Has he discussed new clause 17 with his Front Benchers, and are they minded to support it should it be pressed to a Division?

Mr. Cash: Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is a late entrant to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire said that hey will support new clause 17. I hope that that helps the hon. Gentleman.

The basis of legislative supremacy is that the courts obey Acts of Parliament. You are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to bring me back to that point, because that is the essential point that must be understood.

"The rule of judicial obedience is in one sense a rule of common law...it is the ultimate political fact upon which the whole system of legislation hangs."

Those are the words of Sir William Wade, one of the great constitutional authorities. I mentioned the judgments of Mr. Justice Edward Coke, which, relying on the sovereignty of Parliament, stated that the courts could void Acts of Parliament. We now have democracy, votes and general elections but, unfortunately, in the context of the Human Rights Act 1998, which I shall not dwell on, and the European Communities Act 1972, the judiciary have been trying to push the boundaries beyond the established legislative supremacy of Parliament, by drawing down a greater degree of supranationalism. They have even been saying that treaties have a special status. Neither treaties nor convention can stand in the way of legislation—of Acts of Parliament. All the judicial decisions given in the past several centuries have reasserted that main proposition. Ultimately, the judiciary derive their judicial authority from Parliament and, I should say, from the source of their payments, salaries and allowances.

I mentioned the comments of Lord Steyn, who is by no means a person with whom one would easily disagree. In the case of Manuel v. Attorney-General, Sir Robert Megarry stated unequivocally that "the duty of the court is to obey and apply every Act of Parliament"

What is required to deal with the problem facing us of burdens of business is a clear and unambiguous statement in the Bill, for which the appropriate form of words is:

"notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972"

Even the case of Factortame, which dealt with the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, ultimately depended on the passing of the European Communities Act 1972. In the words of Lord Bridge, Parliament's surrender of sovereignty in the 1972 Act was voluntary. What has been given can be taken away; that is the principle. It does not necessarily follow from my new clause that there would be a political decision and a vote in the House of Commons to do that, although I believe that we have gone far too far in European integration and that we need a substantial and radical retrenchment. Even the judgment of Lord Hope in the recent case of Jackson and others v. Attorney-General ultimately depends on the 1972 Act. Mr. Justice Laws referred to "constitutional statutes", which were purported to be given an additional status over and above ordinary Acts of Parliament. In the context of the European legislation, they themselves would depend on the fact that Parliament had passed the necessary legislation.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), has it in mind that some gold-plating can be removed. However, where that gold-plating ultimately depends on the fundamental and intrinsic nature of the European directive or regulation on which it is based, merely removing it and all the Cabinet Office mechanisms that are employed, including regulatory impact assessments, transposition notes, and so on—complicated stuff that nobody in the small business community really knows exists—will be of no value at all if the fundamental issue is not tackled. In the democracy in which we live, the United Kingdom Parliament acquires its authority from the voters at general elections, which decide the Government. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) is correct: Parliament is first. The bottom line is that we have the right to be able to decide what legislation is to be passed.

There are those, such as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, who—uncritically, I think—are willing to accept pretty well everything that comes from the European Union and do not want it to be amended or repealed. He would argue strongly, as he has today, that the mechanism that I propose is not to his liking. The reality is that we must stipulate that this House is the sovereign place where the democratic wishes of the people of this country are implemented. If it is necessary to override supranational legislation, whether the Human Rights Act or the European Communities Act, it is our right and our duty to do so.

The legislative supremacy of this House is what the Bill is all about and it is the reason I tabled new clause 17. I believe that, in the context of the burdens of business and deregulation, this debate has been necessary. I am extremely glad that my hon. Friends will go into the Lobby to support the new clause.

David Howarth: In one of the more arcane Committee debates, it was discovered that the words "local Act" included Acts of Parliament relating to universities, so as new clause 19 still includes those words I declare my interest as a fellow of a Cambridge college and a university reader.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) is right: in the end, it comes down to a political, diplomatic choice. It is perfectly open to the House to repeal section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 either in whole or in part, and to do whatever it wants with our relationship with Europe. I would not deny any part of his speech when he was making those remarks, but the question is whether those actions would be wise and on that matter he and I might disagree.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that the best amendment in the group is Government amendment No. 10, which removes clause 1—a very good thing to remove. It is an extraordinary provision that allowed the Government to change any primary legislation at will. The theory that the Government appear to be following, and which they appeared to be following last Wednesday night when we were discussing House of Lords reform, is that by their mere existence as the Government they are entitled to whatever legislation they want. But that is not the constitutional theory on which this country is based. Parliament legislates, not the Government.

Another point that we tried to make in Committee, and a mistake into which the Minister appeared to be slipping today, is that it is not the motives of Ministers, or those of the Government that matter, but what the Bill actually says. In that regard, new clause 19 is still defective in two ways. The first is that there is still no control over the subject matter to which the Bill applies. As the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) said, under proposed subsection (6) the provision applies, in principle, to all legislation. In principle, the abolition of jury trial, for example, can be achieved under the Bill by statutory instrument. If new clause 26, which prevents the use of the Bill for amendments to the measure itself and to the Human Rights Act 1998, were passed, even that would not protect jury trial because the Human Rights Act does not in terms, or by implication, protect jury trial. That aspect of our legal tradition is not protected by the European convention on human rights or by our incorporation of it into our law.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said that outlandish possibilities were being discussed, but the erosion of the right to trial by jury by the Labour Government is far from an outlandish possibility. Indeed, every time the Prime Minister talks about changing the balance in the criminal justice system he means measures of that sort.

A second reason why control over subject matter is important is that it would still be possible under new clause 19 to institute major constitutional change by statutory instrument as long as a Minister considered that it would relieve or reduce burdens. That might include abrogation of section 2 of the European Communities Act and would certainly include matters such as the radical reform of local government, which should, in my view, be achieved only by primary legislation. Although the new clause is welcome, it needs to go much further in a number of ways. In a later group, we shall discuss new clause 16, which deals directly with subject matter, but there are other problems with the measure.

The second major problem is the subjective test. The new clause, like the original provision, leaves the decision about whether use of the Bill is appropriate in the hands of the Minister—if the Minister considers that the conditions for its use are fulfilled. The Minister might consider that jury trial—to take that example again—constitutes an administrative or financial burden. It is right that the new clause excludes from the scope of the Bill burdens on Ministers and Departments, but a Minister could easily consider that jury trial imposed burdens on employers, by removing employees from their workplace for the duration of a trial.

It is important to recognise the weakness of the subjective test under the new clause. Our amendment (a) would strengthen that test by inserting the word "reasonably", the effect of which would be to heighten the bar over which the Minister must leap to entitle him to use the Bill. In the longer term, the provision would give the courts clearer guidance when considering new orders under judicial review.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the provision would add an element of objectivity to the test? It would be necessary for a Minister, if pressed, or in judicial review proceedings, to show that there were reasonable grounds on which the reasonableness could be based. There would need to be substantial evidence to support it.

David Howarth: That is an important point. If there were a challenge to ministerial action, it is possible that there would be an attempt at judicial review, but what would be the test applied by the court? Without the word "reasonably", the only test that the court could apply would simply be whether it was true that the Minister indeed considered that the measure was lifting a burden. It would be difficult for a court to get behind a ministerial statement to that effect unless there was clear evidence that what the Minister was saying was not true, or was unbelievable. It is all too believable that a Minister might believe that trial by jury imposed an administrative or financial burden and should be abolished.

The same point applies to the insertion of the word "reasonably" in clause 3. Throughout the debates on the Bill, Ministers have pointed to the protections in clause 3 as a way of deflecting criticism about the removal of necessary rights and freedoms. There has been a debate, or perhaps a lack of understanding, between opposite sides of the House about what those rights are and which of them are necessary. Labour Members were concerned lest Ministers remove rights such as those relating to the minimum wage under the Bill, but Ministers have told them that under clause 3 those rights are "necessary protection". The problem with that is: who says that they are necessary protection? The answer: the Minister—subjectively. Were the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) the Minister, he might have a different view and consider the matter differently from the present Minister.

Conservative Members were keen to emphasise that a different sort of right was necessary and the Minister tried to reassure them in the opposite direction. The Minister's defence of the Bill has run the risk of contradiction on a number of occasions.

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman is on to a very good point. Could not a Government of one complexion use clause 3, for example, to remove administrative burdens and financial penalties from company directors, whereas a Government of a different persuasion could use the same provision to remove administrative burdens and financial penalties from trade unions? He is therefore absolutely right to say that there is not adequate protection in clause 3.

David Howarth: Yes, I believe that to be the case. In fact, Ministers from different parties could make opposite decisions on the same matter but still be within the terms of the Bill, because all that it requires is that Ministers consider that certain things are the case.

The Minister has followed his predecessor in asserting that none of this matters because tomorrow we will pass the Committee veto and all our concerns should fall in at that point. All I say in response is that the Committee veto is not a veto, because the Government retain the right to overturn it in the House as a whole. If it were a Committee veto and there were no appeal against what the Committee decided, the situation might be more interesting, but even then there is the problem to which a number of hon. Members have referred that the Government's in-built majority on all Committees—indeed, their ability to change the membership of Committees in advance, as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster no doubt knows from her previous job—is enough at least to throw into doubt whether that aspect of the so-called Committee veto is an adequate protection.

I find another aspect of new clause 19 particularly disturbing, but I will not refer to it at great length tonight because the best time for that discussion will be tomorrow in a debate on a new clause. However, two amendments in this group deal with the point, and I should explain to the House what they are about. New clause 19, like the old clause 2, contains a provision that allows, by order, legislative power to be transferred to any person. It strikes me as an extraordinary power to grant the Government, and the extent to which the person to whom that power is transferred will be subject to the restrictions in the Bill is not clear. It is that matter to which we will return tomorrow, but it is a major weakness of the Bill that the purpose for which that provision was proposed—it has been proposed again tonight—has never been made properly clear. New clause 19 is an advance on the old clause 1, but it is still deeply defective in many ways. Unless further amendments and further concessions are made, I fear that the Bill is still unacceptable.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I rise in support of new clause 17, and I wish to speak to it quite briefly, but by way of preface I should say that I have an interest to declare in that I have a number of business interests that might conceivably might be beneficiaries of the Bill if it passes into law. From that perspective, I can confirm to the House that over-regulation is the modern scourge. As a population, we are dividing into those who do things and those who stop people doing things. That is having very severe consequences for business activity and, indeed, international competitiveness.

My other credential for speaking in the debate is that I am a member of the European Scrutiny Committee and therefore am able to see that the regulatory itch has not abated in the European Union. Every now and then, the European Commission declares war on over-regulation—it did so again last year—but, again, I can report from my perspective on that Committee that, so far, over-regulation is winning that war. It has shifted into new policies, but the overall volume of legislation has not decreased. That is where new clause 17 becomes relevant.

I wish to remind the House of an example of over-regulation that could become the subject of the Bill. There have been many calls in the debate for hon. Members to give specific examples of regulatory overreach that could engage the House's attention if the Bill is passed. I wish to remind the House that, earlier this year, we passed regulations implementing the artist's resale right, or to give it its French title, the droite de suite regulations, which give living artists, and will eventually give to dead artists as well, a right to a percentage of revenue when their works are resold. The British Government opposed that EU directive, but it was imposed on this country and the House by majority voting. The implementing regulations were debated earlier this year.

Unfortunately, those regulations got into the hands of the Department of Trade and Industry and, specifically, a weak Minister in another place who spectacularly over-regulated. Instead of implementing that directive to the letter and sticking to what was strictly required by the artist's resale right directive, he ensured that the threshold was not €3,000, but €1,000 for a work of art, thus drawing into the net huge numbers of extra businesses and items and completely contradicting the Prime Minister's and the Government's earlier campaign in Brussels to try to get the directive rejected.

The Government understood that the directive would be intensely bureaucratic. Very small sums would be collected and possibly redistributed to artists if they could be found. If a work of art was valuable, it would simply not be sold in London; the business would go to New York. That was demonstrated beyond doubt. All those arguments were forgotten by the DTI. I hope that those regulations will be reconsidered in the course of experience, because they will undoubtedly damage London's position as a leading art market, as well as not in any real way enriching poorer artists.

In a year or two, the Government might wish to amend those regulations, and I hope that they will do so. Given that they are both EU regulations and domestically gold-plated, new clause 17 will be relevant. The House may decide simply to take the regulations back to what is strictly required by the directive; or the House may wish to go further and trespass on the terms of the directive in recognition of the campaign fought, as I have explained, right across the party divide against the directive in the first place. Therefore, it is important that Parliament is aware that those regulations could be amended even though certain requirements are entrenched in a directive. The political judgment at the time might well argue against that, and we might decide not to contradict any provision in the artist's resale right directive, but we do not know. That is a judgment, and it is important that Parliament understands and has it written into the Bill that it has powers to legislate notwithstanding the provisions of the European Communities Act 1972.

New clause 17 is entirely unexceptional; it would not direct the House in any way to touch the 1972 Act. Indeed, it does not mention the 1972 Act as an Act of Parliament; it simply makes it clear that, in future, Parliament could legislate notwithstanding the provisions of that Act. We are not repealing the 1972 Act; we are simply reminding the House and putting into primary legislation the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty under which we all operate and have done ever since parliamentary powers were first discussed.

It is sometimes argued that the 1972 Act is entrenched in some way. Other countries in Europe and around the world have written constitutions that make it impossible for Parliament to legislate in conflict with an entrenched constitution. We do not have that doctrine in this country and if any hon. Member believes that we do, they need to say so now, because otherwise we are proceeding on a false assumption. As long as that doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty endures, I do not find it objectionable to amend the Bill to make it clear that if Parliament explicitly and expressly legislates accordingly, it could override directives that are in pursuance of the 1972 Act.

That is not a constitutional revolution—rather the opposite. The measure is very modest. I hope that the Government—the Minister has given some fairly unconvincing answers to interventions so far—will address the issue of parliamentary powers. We are not saying that a future House will wish to contradict treaty provisions, although the Government are contemplating doing so at the moment. The Human Rights Act 1998 is now under question. Following a suggestion from the leader of my party, the Government are apparently looking seriously at repealing, amending or replacing certain international provisions of the European convention on human rights. That is a specific example of where we may wish to legislate in contradiction to treaty obligations.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend may care to know that one of the most important tomes on constitutional law unequivocally states:

> "The legislative supremacy of Parliament is not limited by international law. The courts may not hold an Act void on the ground that it contravenes general principles of international law."

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend knows his constitutional law. It is established beyond doubt in all parts of the House that the Dicey doctrine, as I have heard it expressed, endures and that no Parliament can bind a successor. Although the Parliament at the time passed the 1972 Act, that is not entrenched and cannot bind a future Parliament. Also, treaty law is not ipso facto binding in domestic law. Some countries, such as France, have a unitary system. When they sign international treaties, by that act, the treaties are binding in French law. We do not have that system.

In conclusion, new clause 17 is unexceptional. It clarifies the legal powers of the House and makes explicit the possibility of overriding international treaties and EU provisions. I therefore urge the House to accept it and I hope that we divide on the issue.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): We come to the House today to watch a rare and wondrous thing: the Government eating a large and probably unpalatable portion of humble pie. The disappointment for all of us involved in the debate is that the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy) is not here to share in that, because he would have got a healthy portion of that humble pie. For months, he suggested that the amendments were not necessary, but today we are considering about 50 Government amendments and new clauses. After telling us that we were simply misunderstanding him and that he had no intention of using the powers, the Government are now spelling out how the changes should be taken forward.

Andrew Miller: It is not fair to criticise someone who is not in the Chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy) came to my Committee and spoke to all four relevant Chairs and has done a darn good job in providing the House with an opportunity to discuss an amended version of the Bill that I hope we can all accept.

Pete Wishart: I think that I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I will come to his Committee's report—I hope that he will be patient for that. The hon. Member for East Renfrewshire was almost responsible for galvanising the sheer opposition to the measures that were being suggested. The way in which he continued to say that there was no problem or issue was totally disingenuous and we now see the Government scurrying to the Chamber to suggest these amendments and new clauses.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): The hon. Gentleman should not allow the Government to get away with the fact that this is not the first time that this has happened. Bill after Bill, we have been told that the particular proposals are innocuous and do not mean what they seem to mean and that we are getting worried about things unnecessarily; Bill after Bill, the Government have to come to the House and taken the stuff out again.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who has great experience in these matters. His words will be listened to carefully by the Government. He is entirely right that, when we start to scrutinise Bills—I credit the Select Committee chaired by the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) for providing that function—we see some of the sinister applications of some of that legislation. That is exactly the case here, with what we first presumed was an innocuous Bill. The Government proposed to give themselves almost unprecedented powers to change almost any law by order, rather than having it debated on the Floor of the House. While the Bill was in Committee, the then Minister in charge told us to trust him and that he would never consider highly controversial legislation, without even telling us what "controversial" was. When we asked him to include that in the Bill, he refused. Not having that in the Bill means that the statement is not worth the paper that it is not written on.

The Public Administration Committee weighed in with its concern. I applaud it for saying that the Bill

"gives the Government powers which are entirely disproportionate to its stated aims."

The Committee also wanted to place things beyond the Bill's reach and warned diplomatically that the Government's undertakings that they would limit the use of the powers were meaningless unless they were written in the law. I congratulate the Committee on those remarks.

A week ago, there was an announcement that there would be further amendments. That was the same night that the Government faced a humiliating gubbing at the hands of the local English electorate. The amendments mean that it is almost like we are considering the Second Reading of the Bill. The debate does not feel like the remaining stages; it feels like a Second Reading.

Mr. Heath: It is a Second Reading of this new first clause; the most important operative clause. That is why it is so important that we have the opportunity to press amendments to it.

Pete Wishart: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right. The fact that it feels so much like a Second Reading means that the Bill is almost calling out for further scrutiny. We have seen a number of the amendments for the first time in the course of the past week. They need further debate and consideration and it is unfortunate that this House will not consider the important new changes; it will be the other place. We will not have an opportunity to influence that debate, because we do not have seats in the other place. I hope that when the Bill returns to this House, we will get a further opportunity to look at some of the measures. I hope that, when it returns to us, it will be a better Bill for us to consider.

We have a whole new raft of amendments and new clauses to address. In the main, I concede that most of the concerns have been addressed, but there are still issues and outstanding points that have to be looked at. That is why today's debate has been so important. There is no doubt whatsoever that new clause 19 is an improvement on the former clause 1, but there are still concerns and ambiguities. There are still lots of questions for the Minister to answer.

For instance, in the case of new clause 19, what constitutes a reduction in burdens remains totally ambiguous. I know that the Government give a list in subsection (3), but when we start to unravel it, as we have done today, we can see that there are issues and problems. We have to address what we should call the Rushcliffe question—after the question that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) put to the Minister today. We could be talking about something that applies to the climate change levy. We have had no satisfactory response from the Government about controversial legislation being addressed through orders under the Bill. The Rushcliffe question deserves an adequate response from the Minister.

David Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the problem of vagueness and ambiguity in the Bill would be at least partly resolved if amendment (a) to new clause 19 were agreed to? If the word "reasonably" was inserted into new clause 19, the question of judicial review would be opened up in a way that would not be possible as the measure stands.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing my attention to amendment (a). He is entirely right. Amendments (a) to (e) would improve new clause 19, so I assure him that we will support them. I hope that amendment (a) is pressed to a Division.

There has been no debate whatsoever about some of the outstanding definitions in the Bill.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): If the hon. Gentleman had volunteered to serve on the Committee, he would have been aware that we have had such debates. Perhaps he could have been here on Second Reading, too.

Pete Wishart: We in the minority parties have great difficulty securing places on Committees, so I look forward to the support of the hon. Lady when we try to do so.

Andrew Miller: When the hon. Gentleman is making a bid for membership of the Regulatory Reform Committee, he can tell the usual channels that the Tories never turn up.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I think that I had best move on.

We have not heard about the definition of "legislation". There is an attempt to define it in subsection (6) of new clause 19, which states that it includes "a public general Act or local Act (whether passed before or after the commencement of this section)".

That would include many Acts of Parliament of constitutional import, including the Scotland Act 1998. Will the Minister tell me whether the Scotland Act would be covered by that definition?

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): And the Government of Wales Act 1998.

Pete Wishart: Could changes be made to the provisions of the Scotland Act and, as my hon. Friend says, the Government of Wales Act without recourse to debate on the Floor of the House?

We must also consider subsection 7(c) of new clause 19 because although the measure includes an attempt to define "legislation", there is no definition of "enactment". Under the subsection, a ministerial order may provide for the transfer or delegation of "functions conferred on any person by any enactment".

The broad-ranging power would enable Ministers to reconstruct completely many statutory bodies, executive agencies and non-departmental parties simply through subordinate legislation. Furthermore, subsection 7(d) gives Ministers the power to abolish any "body or office established by or under an enactment."

It is noteworthy that subsection (7) uses the word "enactment", although the rest of new clause 19 uses the word "legislation". However, unlike the word "legislation", the word "enactment" does not seem to be defined.

Several further matters need to be addressed, so it is unfortunate that we have lost parliamentary time for debating a measure that is, in fact, a new Bill. I hope that the Bill will be improved in the other place. I do not want the Minister to choke on his humble pie because he has moved some way to improve the Bill, but I hope that we will have the opportunity to improve it further. I hope that we will have the opportunity to vote on the Liberal Democrat amendments to new clause 19 because they would improve the measure significantly.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I apologise to the Minister that I was not in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate to hear his speech. I welcome him to his new post and hope that I can co-operate with him to make the Bill better than it is at the moment and better even from how it will stand after it has been amended as the Government propose.

I was one of the Labour Members who were deeply concerned about the original Bill. When I read clause 1, I found it difficult to believe that the Government were seriously proposing a Bill that would allow them to legislate by order on almost any sphere of government and to amend any Act, including, apparently, the Bill itself. However, improvements have been made, so I am grateful to the Minister's predecessor, who wrote to me about the Bill and discussed it with me at length. My concerns were shared by several Labour Members, and one had to be worried about such a general measure.

Even in its amended form, the Bill will be too all-inclusive. I would prefer to have a Bill that specified positively what was included, instead of setting out exemptions. Such a Bill would thus specify the areas to which it related, rather than including a general provision to open the way to changing any legislation. Such a change of approach would be a major step towards a Bill that everyone could support.

I am worried about the question of burdens on business. I am one of those who think that business ought to have some burdens on it. Good regulations exist, but there is an implication that burdens of any kind are bad on business and that business should be as free as possible to do whatever it likes. I do not accept that. Let us consider simple measures, such as building regulations. Some 20 years ago, a builder did some work on my house. I thought that it was not right, so I called in the building inspector and the builder had to do the work again. There was a burden on that builder, but it meant that my house was safe to live in after the work had been done, so it was absolutely right.

Alison Seabeck: We have heard a lot of concerns about regulation from Opposition Members, but people in the City and financial institutions say that the regulations that exist in the City attract financial institutions there from other parts of the world because they know that it will be a safe place to do business.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend makes a strong point. Regulations can be good or bad; beneficial or disadvantageous. I hope that we will continue to use building regulations.

Other aspects of regulation can be dealt with annually through the general Bills that come before the House. An obvious example is taxation, which is addressed in clause 5. Any change to taxation can be achieved through each year's Finance Bill. Clause 5 states:

"Provision under section 2(1) may not impose or increase taxation."

I know that the wording will be amended, but the Government will still be able to use delegated legislation to change taxation outside a Finance Bill. There is no reason whatsoever for such a provision. Indeed, I would prefer the provision to include the word "change" rather than the phrase "impose or increase" because it implies that imposing or increasing taxation is bad, but that is not necessarily the truth. There are areas of life in which I would like taxes to be increased and, perhaps, less tax in other areas. I would like clause 5 to be taken out of the Bill.

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Gentleman is being disingenuous. Finance Bills provide every mechanism for increasing taxation and are subject to proper scrutiny. I hope that he is not suggesting for one moment that we should enter a realm of taxation by the means of an instrument?

Kelvin Hopkins: Precisely. Provisions on taxation are misplaced in the Bill. Taxation should be covered by Finance Bills, and as we have a Finance Bill each year, there is no problem with delay. It is not as if we can legislate on taxation only every five or 10 years.

A Bill on business is going through the other place. Such a generalised Bill would be a mechanism to make changes that would no doubt help business to run more smoothly. All sorts of general Bills come through the House regularly, so they could be used to make such changes.

It was suggested that the Government need such an approach on changing legislation because of the frustrations of the legislative process, but I understand that the problems have a lot to do with delays in Departments of State. The difficulties that civil servants have when bringing forward changes is much more of a delaying factor for Government legislation than the House. Short and punchy Bills that make small changes can go through the House quickly with little debate. Such simple Bills would be the appropriate way of dealing with problems that concern the House.

There are other ways to approach the problems. A number of detailed changes could be made. I much appreciated the speech by the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth). It was thoughtful and well made. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said. I was surprised to hear that he voted for the Single European Act, which I would not have done at the time. Had he not voted for it, and had his party not voted for it, a lot of grief would have been saved. We would have had a much more loose-limbed European Union, causing much less difficulty for us all in all sorts of ways.

As I came into the debate late, I do not intend to speak for long. I hope that the Government amendments and what the other place does to the Bill will make it something that we can all support.

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) laid bare his soul by suggesting that he had been defective in not appreciating the burden of what the Bill was about. I join him in that state of sin inasmuch as the titles of Bills often deceive us as to their purpose or intent. For example, who could possibly have objected to the Civil Contingencies Bill? It was an important measure. Yet part 2 contained the right of Ministers, down to Whips, by statutory instrument or Order in Council, to change or suspend all the laws of this land with the exception, and only under pressure, of the European convention on human rights and therefore the Human Rights Act 1998. The title of a Bill does not necessarily indicate what it is about. We owe a debt of thanks to the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), as we do to the Select Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), for drawing our attention to what the Bill is and was.

On new clause 19, I accept that, following the furore in the press and the wider reaches of our nation, the Government agreed that the form they had adopted was inappropriate. I still think that the new clause as it stands, as a measure of unwinding parliamentary procedure and the authority of the House, is not satisfactory. It could be satisfactory to some extent if amendment (a) were agreed to. That is crucial. The point was well made that "reasonably" constrains and better defines what it is that the Minister must do, so that he can be challenged in court if he acts unreasonably. It is a critical amendment.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) well made the point about whether we can decrease taxation by order. It is unthinkable that one should do that. I will vote against—confidently—new clause 19 on the basis that, on such a delicate, essential assertion of what is the proper process by which we discuss and consider law, it does not meet the test.

The only other amendment that I intend to speak to is new clause 17, which I tabled. There is an extraordinarily important principle behind it, and it goes both ways. I made a simple intervention on my right hon. and learned Friend. Is the Bill the way to alter something that has been so important to the life of our nation? I wholly disagree with our membership of the European Community; do not doubt that. I did not stand by and vote for the Single European Act, unlike my more craven hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). I voted against a guillotine, and it was guillotined, as is this debate. There are sections of the Bill that we cannot, or are unlikely to, discuss because of the figure of the great guillotine motion. I have spoken against those things all my political life in the House, and it bites us in the end.

On the disapplication of the European Communities Act 1972, new clause 17 addresses the elephant in our house. The Modernisation Committee went to Finland about two years ago. The Finnish committee that judges and scrutinises European legislation accepted that 80 per cent. of its legislation came from Europe. In the case of the German Bundestag—Mrs. Merkel made reference to it—70 per cent. of its legislation comes from the European Community. Last week—my hon. Friend the Member for Stone was in attendance—Vaclav Klaus gave a lecture in London to American business men, saying that 75 to 80 per cent. of the legislation of the Czech Republic emanates from Europe.

Our Cabinet Office two years ago suggested that, more modestly in Britain, only 40 per cent. of our legislation emanates from the European Community. How can we have a deregulation Bill without acknowledging that the greater part of our legislation, including the statutory instruments that follow it and the regulation that is attendant on it, now emanates from the European Community? In some instances, it has direct application in our law without even troubling the House. We have a process, through statutory instruments, by which those laws are nodded through.

What is the purpose of the new clause? First, can we ignore the fact that that quantum of legislation is not regarded for the purposes of the Bill? The new clause says no. My second concern, which is more important, relates to the constitutional affirmation accepted by, I think, the hon. Member for Cambridge and articulated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. I am a more simple Member of the House. The long march to our democracy is summed up by Churchill's exclamation as to who is sovereign: the people are sovereign. The new clause is an expression of that sovereignty. The bypassing of that sovereignty by other means is not appropriate.

Mr. Heald: If my hon. Friend wants new clause 19 to be amended, it has to be passed. Then we would have the opportunity of considering amendment (a). Does he agree that not to pass the new clause would mean that we end up with what was in the Bill originally, which was appalling—namely, that a Minister, by order, could pass any law for any purpose in any way? I hope that he is prepared to accept the logic that the new clause is a bit better, because then amendment (a) might be possible.

Mr. Shepherd: No. The effort of the House should go into making a piece of legislation appropriate and correct as we see it. We cannot have a vote on amendment (a) until we have had a vote on new clause 19. My vote—let me set out this condition—is wholly dependent on the Government saying that they accept "reasonable". That is how I would do it. If they say, "No, we will not accept it", then I will not vote for the new clause and will look to the other place to rewrite the Bill. I have no doubt that it will include the reasonable element.

Mr. Chope: Will my hon. Friend extend his comments to amendment (b)? Does he accept that we will not know until we have voted on new clause 19 whether amendments (a) and (b) will be called for a vote?

Mr. Shepherd: I absolutely accept the point. Again, that reinforces why I will not vote for the new clause until the Minister has conceded, or accepted, the burden of the argument and will accept those amendments. That is a matter of principle. The House, having regard to its own dignity, should not just say that because the previous draft of the Bill was so dreadful and has, properly and rightly, been improved to some extent—I give credit to the Government for that—it does not seek the things that qualify the powers of a Minister. That is the heart of the matter, and why the argument is about ourselves and the sovereignty of this place, which my hon. Friend is trying to promote. This issue is incredibly important for the House, because it is about ourselves, our country and our authority—the authority that this Bill and a raft of other legislation confers, each reducing the power of the House for the benefit of the Executive. That is the struggle.

7.30 pm

Why are we having to amend or to do away with so much legislation? It is because the volume of legislation and the sheer weight of statutory instruments are such that we cannot accord to them the traditional form of repealing an Act of Parliament by another Act of Parliament. It is a short cut. In the modern age we do not give the proper amount of time to deliberation on and consideration of matters before the House. That is what I am arguing for. I hope that the Government will accept amendments (a) and (b), and I hope that the House will acknowledge the importance of the constitutional principle that underlines my hon. Friend's proposal.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that a Government who refuse to include the word "reasonable" are suggesting that in some circumstances they wish to act unreasonably and that the word "reasonable" is so reasonable that it would look very unreasonable if they did not accept it?

Mr. Shepherd: My right hon. Friend has made a brilliant point. He and I have made that point about Governments of other complexions who have resisted the concept of reasonableness because the Executive, advised by draftsmen or by their own self-importance, have felt that it is an unreasonable constraint to be reasonably constrained.

Rob Marris: I apologise to the Opposition Front Benchers for not being here earlier, although I was present for the opening speech of my hon. Friend the Minister. I declare an interest as a member of the Law Society of England and Wales, which is a regulated body and therefore might be affected by the Bill.

I heard earlier, and have heard since returning to the Chamber following meetings, a lot of wounded outrage from Opposition Members, particularly Conservatives. Having sat through most of the Second Reading debate, my recollection is that at its conclusion there was no Division. [Interruption.] Somebody says that there was a one-line Whip, but I took the trouble to be present and other hon. Members could have done so. There have been howls of outrage from the Opposition because they feel that they missed a trick on Second Reading by not calling a Division.

Mr. Heath: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Rob Marris: I shall make my point and then give way to the hon. Gentleman, who was present on Second Reading.

On Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), the then Minister, who is present tonight, said that he did not wish the Bill to be used for controversial measures. Understandably, he was asked what would be considered a controversial measure, and quite reasonably he said that that was a difficult definition which he had been discussing with parliamentary draftsmen and that he would table amendments at a later stage—and he has done so.

Mr. Heath: I make no attempt to justify after the event the position that I took on Second Reading, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recollect that I said clearly that there was a need for a deregulatory Bill but that part 1 was wholly unsatisfactory and that if it remained in the Bill I would be advising my hon. Friends to vote against Third Reading. Part 1 will not do.

Rob Marris: I recall the hon. Gentleman saying that, but the amendments before us substantially rewrite part 1, and he must make up his mind whether to vote for them.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Gentleman says that the former Minister came to the House on Second Reading having been unable to work out how to include in the Bill the safeguards, and on Report they are finally appearing. Is that not a classic example of why we have so much bad legislation? It comes to the House too soon, before it is ready. The Minister should have brought the legislation before the House once he had worked out how to include the safeguards that he wanted, so that under our procedures we could have considered them more efficiently, rather than leaving the issue to be discussed in a shorter debate on Report.

Rob Marris: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. As often happens in this House, we like to have it both ways. The idea to my mind and for many hon. Members was to have a public debate on this important Bill. We have had that debate in the intervening period. The then Minister put forward proposals and serious reservations were expressed by Opposition Members and by Labour Members, including me, and the Minister said that he would consider them. He has done so, and his successor has come forward with quite wide-ranging amendments, on which I shall remark later.

Pete Wishart: Is not the truth that the Government were told by the Chief Whip in the Lords that they would never have got the Bill through in its original condition?

Rob Marris: I cannot remember whether the hon. Gentleman was present on Second Reading—I do not think that he was—but the then Minister made it clear that the Bill was not in the final form that he envisaged would go to the other place. He was entirely honest and open with the House. He said that we needed more safeguards and that he was open to suggestions. He has listened to those suggestions, yet his successor is being slagged off for that.

Mr. Greg Knight: Has not the hon. Gentleman just shot his own fox? It is because the Minister made it clear that he was willing to listen to arguments that many of us did not vote against Second Reading.

Rob Marris: The Government have listened to the arguments. They might not have accepted them all, but they have listened—hence the fairly fundamental amendments before us. If amendments that we shall consider today and tomorrow are accepted—it is up to the House whether they are—fairly fundamental safeguards will be in the Bill. There are the five locks of constitutional safeguards. As I said in my intervention on my hon. Friend the Minister, my parliamentary neighbour, I have concerns that we will end up with the same kind of Bill this year that we did five years ago—completely unworkable in the way that most Members would wish because of those safeguards. He referred to the Game Act 1831, which is why the wonderful Bridgewater's butcher that is about 100 m from where I live has a sign outside it. I am sure that Bob will be happy to dispense with that sign.

I suspect that most hon. Members would be happy if such regulation were got rid of. On the other hand, dealing with major tax increases—or tax cuts, which might still be allowed under clause 5—would not be appropriate under the Bill. There are five locks and among other things they involve two Select Committees—one in this House and one in the other place. Select Committees, certainly in this House, have traditionally had a majority who are members of the Government party. That is the way in which this House has operated since Select Committees were formed—in 1971 or whenever. Anyone who thinks that a Select Committee Chairman or his or her members are patsies have not served on one as I have. I refer not just to my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) or whoever his successor might be. I have never come across a Select Committee member who is a patsy. Select Committees will put a block and a lock on a proposal if it is controversial, as I think amendment No. 56 says.

Alison Seabeck: Talking about locks, what seems to be missing in this debate is what the public think. The public's expression of concern over the Bill has had quite a significant impact on the drafting of amendments. We forget that.

Rob Marris: Indeed concern was expressed outside the House. I suspect that much of it was somewhat uninformed in the sense that many of those who expressed concern were not aware of the promises and undertakings given by the then Minister on Second Reading that there would be more safeguards—and there will be if the amendments are passed.

I speak in favour of the amendments, but I caution my hon. Friend, the present Minister, to be careful that the pendulum does not swing too far the other way so that, if I am fortunate enough still to be a Member in five years' time, I will have to take part in a debate in which people say that the 2006 Act had got rid of only 21 regulations in contradistinction to 19 or whatever it was under the 2001 legislation. Frankly, that will have wasted a whole bunch of the House's time.

Mr. Chope: I had the privilege of speaking on Second Reading, when I said:

"The Bill is the ultimate guillotine for debate and discussion."—[Official Report, 9 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 1079.]

My concerns were not understated, as I cited the Chairman of the Constitution Committee of the House of Lords, who said that the measure was the most constitutionally significant Bill for a generation. The new clause is an incredible improvement, but that does not mean that we should accept it willy-nilly. Unfortunately, the Government are adept at manipulating the procedures of the House, so we are in danger of being outmanoeuvred again by the Executive, as we do not have the power to press amendments to the new clause until the new clause has been accepted.

Mr. Gummer: For the sake of people outside the House, will my hon. Friend clarify something? Does he agree that the Government introduced a Bill that they knew would not complete its passage through the House with the aim of introducing provisions that ought to have been included in the Bill in the first place and thus are extremely difficult to correct? We should not accept that constitutional extravagance.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right. Previous deregulation Bills were subject to pre-legislative scrutiny. The Bill goes much further and wider, but it was not subject to such scrutiny. We can only assume that the Government's motive was to present us with a fait accompli. They tried to seduce us into accepting the provision on the ground that it was not as unreasonable as the original proposal. I very much agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd): in the absence of ministerial assurances on amendments (a) and (b), I am not minded to vote in support of new clause 19 and, indeed, shall register my opposition. If, however, it is accepted and the amendments are put to the vote, we have the chance to make it less odious. At least we will have had the chance to put our concern on the record in the event that the amendments are not tested.

My amendment (b) is an important and necessary measure. I appreciate the support that it has received from Members on both sides of the House, including my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), Liberal Democrat Members and, by implication, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher). The Minister appeared to suggest that it was a good amendment, but went on to say that he would not support it. Indeed, he said that he would seek to oppose it. Unfortunately, we could not establish what he thought was wrong with it.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister said that we would return to amendment (b), but his words definitely suggested that the new clause should be constrained by the amendment.

Mr. Chope: If that is what the Minister thought, he was right. New clause 19(2) describes the purpose that the Minister would have to establish as one of "removing or reducing any burden, or the overall burdens, resulting directly or indirectly for any person from any legislation".

By my reading, provided that the Minister can establish that the purpose is to remove a burden from one person, even though that would increase the overall burden for 1 million others, there is no reason why he should not use the truncated procedures in the Bill with the limited safeguards that we have debated.

The title of the new clause—"Power to remove or reduce burdens"—is disingenuous, and we should add the words, "or increase overall burdens". The Government say that they wish to reduce the overall burden, but if that is the case and they do not have a sinister purpose in the Bill, they should accept my amendment (b).

Mr. Greg Knight: Can my hon. Friend make his position clear on the amendment? Does he hope that the Chair will allow the House to divide on it, or is he merely alluding to it?

Mr. Chope: I hope that the House will have the chance to divide on it, but I cannot guarantee that, so I am obliged to vote against new clause 19 unless the Minister gives an undertaking at the Dispatch Box to accept amendments (a) and (b). That is the only way in which we can proceed because, following the initiative that the Government have taken, humble Back Benchers cannot vote on the amendments before we vote on the new clause. As Chairman of the Procedure Committee, my right hon. Friend deserves a great deal of credit for the fact that we have two days of debate. Originally, the Government intended that we should have only one day of debate, as they knew that they wanted to make substantial amendments to the Bill. That would have squeezed even more the opportunity for Back Benchers to comment.

This is an important Bill. I had the privilege of speaking against it on Second Reading, and I served on the Standing Committee. As a result of our efforts in Committee, the Government have begun to see sense, but they still have a long way to go. I look forward to the Minister accepting amendments (a) and (b). As for amendment (c), which proposes that the new clause apply only to public general Acts, it is regrettable that he still insists that it should apply much more widely to local acts, Orders in Council, orders, rules, regulations and so on, as set out in subsection (6). The Bill would be better if the provision were confined to public general Acts. The only local Act that the Government have been able to cite is the Covent Garden Market Act 1961. If they used a truncated provision to change the legislation governing the Covent Garden Market Authority, it could have a severe impact on people who use the authority, businesses that rely on it, landowners and so on. Why should such local legislation not be subject to the full rigour of scrutiny and debate? People may believe that local Acts are less significant, but they are often supremely significant to people who live in the locality that is affected. Under procedures in this Parliament, they may not receive notice of proposed changes until it is too late and the measure has been considered by the Regulatory Reform Committee. The Bill should extend only to public general Acts, not to local Acts.

Mr. Gummer: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that there is nothing in the Bill to stop the Government changing Acts of Parliament passed by the House but prepared by the General Synod of the Church of England? Under the new clause, they could change without question something decided by that forum, which underlines the fact that the provision is nonsense.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend makes an excellent point that I hope will be reflected in amendments tabled in another place. It is a pity that we have not had a chance to consider amendments along those lines on Report.

The Government have a secret agenda in relation to the Bill. It has been exposed to an extent and they have had to pull back from the high watermark of what they were trying to achieve by way of suppressing parliamentary debate and scrutiny. They have fallen back to an intermediate line, which is still too high in terms of what we are giving up as scrutineers of legislation in Parliament. I hope that the Minister will give us assurances that he will go further and provide more safeguards than new clause 19 contains.

Mr. Djanogly: I declare my interests as they appear in the Register of Members' Interests.

This has been a complicated debate, not helped by the Government's ineptitude over recent months in taking the Bill through the House. The Government new clauses, including new clause 19, were tabled very late, which has not been satisfactory or productive. Here we are, on Report, debating the main clause, which was tabled only a few days ago.

The process of the Bill has been bizarre. I have never seen anything like it. On Second Reading, the Government were saying that the Bill was purely a tool for delivering their better regulation agenda. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and I rebutted that on Second Reading. We said that it was a gross understatement of the purpose of what became the "abolition of Parliament Bill". We argued that, as a constitutional Bill, it should have had its Committee stage on the Floor of the House. The Government chose not to listen to us, but in retrospect they probably wish they had.

The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) rightly mentioned the lack of preparation. By the time of the Procedure Committee on 7 February, the then Minister said that he would be able to respond to the Regulatory Reform Committee's recommendations in good time, in advance of the Standing Committee, but when the Standing Committee started on 28 February, the Government had given their response to Committee members only the day before and no Government amendments had been tabled, as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) correctly pointed out in Committee.

The timing of the proceedings has been unsatisfactory throughout. My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) mentioned that in his intervention and noted that that is becoming increasingly common on the Government's part, although it is particularly the case in relation to the Bill. Not least for these reasons, my noble Friends in another place may well want to review carefully the implications of the clause, which has been impossible for us, because of the lack of time and the fact that the Government ripped out the main clauses of the Bill. Even now, they are tabling amendments to change the title of the Bill.

Government new clause 19, which was tabled only a few days ago, has, along with new clauses 20 and 21, the effect of replacing clauses 1 and 2. These changes, or perhaps I should say climbdowns, will refocus orders that are to be introduced under the Bill towards deregulation, as advocated by the Conservative party since Second Reading. Since the Bill's publication in January, we have consistently expressed grave concerns that the powers granted to the Government were too widely drawn and would result in a severe weakening of parliamentary power, the sidelining of legislative scrutiny and the possibility of a move towards ministerial authoritarian rule.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire noted, we were happy with the Government's announcement on 12 April that they had effectively agreed with the framework arguments advanced over the past few months from the Conservative Benches. We therefore welcome the new clause, which aims to focus the Bill on genuine deregulatory matters, although it would have been helpful to see the new clauses sooner, not least because of the widespread interest in the subject and our belief that other, later amendments should go further than the Government are prepared to accept.

The Conservative party has always supported measures that would result in the provision of a swift tool for delivering regulatory reform. However, we wanted to ensure that such a tool would not pose a serious challenge to the concept of parliamentary supremacy, which is a central element of the United Kingdom's unwritten constitution. Our policy is aimed at reducing the harm caused to the country by over-regulation introduced by the Government since 1997. The cost of regulation during that period is estimated to have surpassed £50 billion a year, despite the Labour party's manifestos for the 1997, 2001 and 2005 general elections promising to regulate only where necessary and to deregulate where desirable.

The over-regulation of business is a massive drain on the economy, leads to an inefficient bureaucracy, strangles small businesses and wastes the valuable time of thousands of police officers, nurses, teachers and people in the private sector on filling in forms.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the sum of £50 billion. Quite a large part of that calculation, which I think was made by the British Chambers of Commerce, refers to the national minimum wage. Is he saying that he opposes the national minimum wage as a regulatory burden?

Mr. Djanogly: The figure does not refer to the national minimum wage. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire dealt with that point earlier.

Over-regulation is severely damaging Britain's international economic competitiveness. As my hon. Friend reminded us, according to the World Economic Forum, between 1997 and 2005, the UK slipped from fourth to 13th in the list of the most competitive countries. The London School of Economics has cited over-regulation as one of the main causes of that decline. Small companies have been disproportionately hit, which is why in new clause 9 we propose that any Minister making an order under part 1 powers must ensure that it is deregulatory as it relates to small business.

That is also why, in new clause 17, my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) seeks to ensure that, where a fast-track deregulation order is made in connection with a provision concerning our EU obligations, it should be legally binding and effective. The Minister responded that that was an attempt to change policy, but my hon. Friend's amendment deserves a more considered approach. I look forward to hearing the Minister's views.

Mr. Cash: In the context of legislative supremacy and the role of the judiciary, and in the context of the Constitutional Reform Act 2005, will my hon. Friend confirm that, irrespective of the rule of law, which insists that they should be independent, it is the duty of judges to give effect to Acts of Parliament, as has been historically, legally and constitutionally the case for generations?

Mr. Djanogly: That sounds like good law to me. The Minister will, of course, tell me if he thinks otherwise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and the hon. Members for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) and for Cambridge (David Howarth) expressed concern that the Bill could be used for a wider purpose than striking out business regulations. An example given was the abolition of jury trials. The Minister, fairly, showed the lack of clarity in the 2001 Act and how clauses 5 and 6 answered the important points made, but he did not go far enough. There is more to come out in that respect, probably in the other place. Following an intervention from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), it turned out that the restrictions relating to tax relate only to increases in tax.

The right hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller)—I congratulate him on being appointed a Privy Councillor—

Andrew Miller: No. That was a joke.

Mr. Djanogly: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. We have not had many jokes during the debate.

The hon. Gentleman properly noted that Standing Orders of the House will need to be reviewed in the context of the Bill. I enjoyed hearing his views on the sugar beet order, or rather, the problems in getting rid of it.

The hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for Cambridge made many valuable points in the debate, not least identifying the posing threat of the laws forcing the Government to review the scope of the Bill in the first place, and also in reducing the scope of the Executive to interpret the provisions of the Bill. Their explanation of why amendment (a) should introduce the word "reasonably" to create objectivity rather than ministerial subjectivity was persuasive.

I agreed with many of the sentiments about the growth of the power of the Executive and the serious consequences that could follow from that, not least in relation to the Bill, expressed by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, but he should have a quick read of the debate on Second Reading, including my remarks.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe noticed the irony in what he called the minor miracle that turned what should have been a positive desire to reduce regulation into the messy Bill that is before us. He stated his position that new clause 19 is still too lax in its wording. I am sure that his arguments on the new clause will be carefully reviewed by colleagues, not least in another place. Many of his comments, not only in relation to veto rights, will be addressed later in our proceedings. We benefited from his experience in his summary of how Government have been nibbling away, as he called it, at parliamentary freedoms over the past 50 years. His comments were strongly supported by the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who also spoke up for amendment (a) and new clause 17, and gave a general call—

Andrew Miller: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who is not prone to over-exaggeration, slightly got things wrong? The hon. Gentleman will recall that the legislation enacted by his right hon. and learned Friend, in section 2(2) of the Value Added Tax Act 1994, means that a statutory instrument to change VAT could have effect only for a short period. That is notwithstanding all the restraints of the sixth directive. I think that the hon. Gentleman is slightly exaggerating the case.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman has made his point in his own way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills made a general call for proper time to be given to the important changes that are proposed. I think that he was making a general point about legislation being rushed through the House. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) loaned us the significant benefit of his large experience of deregulation. He questioned whether the provisions in the Bill were the best way to achieve the initial objective. He thought not, and I shall return to that key issue. I like the idea of having an annual deregulation Bill and the implied requirement to tutor civil servants in the merits of deregulation, that being key to the cultural change.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) gave a good example of the dreadful droit de suite law as a showpiece of gold-plating of EU regulations and demonstrated the importance of keeping the 1972 legislation in the context of parliamentary sovereignty.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) made a thoughtful speech. I liked his idea of short Bills. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch has closely followed consideration of the Bill, and was active in Committee. He put a good case for amendment (b). He argued that the reduction of the burden for one should not be justified by increasing burdens for others. On that, my hon. Friend has our support.

Will the Government amendments work? Will deregulation be improved as a result of the new formula that is proposed? The expectations of businesses are high. The Government have talked the talk. In May of last year, the Financial Times reported that the Bill would be an attempt to slash the estimated £100 billion of the cost of regulation on business. In January, the Minister then responsible was quoted as saying that the Bill is the "cornerstone in achieving essential and long-promised reductions in unnecessary red tape."

It is part of a plan to achieve one of the most radical regulatory reform agendas in the world. The then Minister's press release in January spoke of savings through reducing bureaucracy of £10 billion, equivalent to 1 per cent. of gross domestic product.

[Mr. Djanogly]

The fact remains that regulations on business have continued to soar. We know that, since 2001, only about 20 regulatory reform orders have been made, although the target was 60 by 2005. On average, with 3,887 new regulations a year, let us say that the Government get really ambitious and raise the target of scrapping regulations from 60 every four years to 60 a year, or even 100 a year. Is that not like putting in a barrier the size of a road hump to stop a tidal wave? Are 60 fewer regulations worth the destruction of parliamentary sovereignty? That is what we were considering in the early stages of the Bill. We came to the conclusion that the answer was no.

We appreciate that the Government have gone some way towards understanding the issues and addressing the concerns of the House, not least with the amendments. However, in the new atmosphere of realism, will the Minister please care in his remarks to reassess the impact that he thinks that the Bill will have on regulation?

Mr. McFadden: I feel that in some senses the ghost of St. Augustine has been with us in this debate. There have been many speeches from all quarters of the House about how much people want to see regulation cut, but not in the way that is proposed, and perhaps not yet. I think, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) said, that that is perhaps a danger for us as we come to debate the amendments. However, I welcome the comments that have been made about new clause 19, especially by the Opposition Front-Bench spokespersons. I do not pretend that they embraced the clause with open arms but they at least recognised that the Government had attempted to respond to some of the fears and concerns that have been expressed about the Bill. The Government did not accept that those fears and concerns would necessarily have been realised.

I shall try to stay out of some of the private battles that we heard this afternoon between my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) and some Opposition Members. There were battles also between some Opposition Members about our membership of the European Union.

I turn to amendment (b) to the new clause, which concerns burdens and whether they can be reduced overall. New clause 19 permits the "removing or reducing" of a "burden". "Removing or reducing" a burden from one person may possibly increase burdens on another, even if the overall effect is downward in terms of deregulation. The example has been used of perhaps increasing the burden on a million but reducing the burden on one. That is not likely. However we could increase the burden on one and reduce the burden on a million. That is what we mean by saying that the overall effect should be downward. It is the same as the 2001 legislation that would allow the introduction of more targeted or more proportionate burdens in the context of an overall downward trend. New clause 19 also permits the removal or reduction of overall burdens. It could permit the introduction of new burdens if it is done in the context of reducing the burdens overall. For that reason, we may not be able to say yes to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope).

Mr. Chope: Why does the Minister believe that the new clause, as drafted, does not give permission for an overall increase in burdens?

Mr. McFadden: The Bill provides that under part 2 the purpose is to remove or reduce any burden—including the overall burdens—that result either directly or indirectly for any person under the legislation.

Sir Robert Smith: The clause includes the word "or". The amendment seeks to replace that with "and". With the "or" still in place we can remove any burden but we do not have to remove overall burdens. The overall burden can increase. As I have said, there is an "or". The Minister can say that he is removing a burden even though there is an increase in overall burdens. There is still compliance as things stand.

Mr. McFadden: No, the overall burden would be reduced. We cannot accept amendment (b) because if we did, in the context of reducing the overall burden, a burden could be increased on one person.

I anticipate that there will be future examples where legislation covering an entire area could be rationalised to benefit those regulated. However, amendment (b) would narrow the order-making power so much that many of the reforms that were possible under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 would no longer be possible.

I turn to the reasonableness test in amendment (a). The Minister is already under a public duty to reach a reasonable view. We discussed who could object to a reasonableness test, and although the views expressed are on one level true, the amendment would add nothing to the duty that the Minister is already under to act reasonably. Case law has established that if a Minister's decision is not reasonable, it can be struck down by the courts, so the existing subjective test is a real one.

David Howarth: The Minister seems to be confused. The point is that under the subjective test in the Bill as it stands, all that the judicial review will study is whether the Minister considered a particular thing to be the case. If the word "reasonably" is included, deciding whether the Minister acted reasonably in that context becomes a more objective test. The Minister has a dilemma: either the word "reasonably" makes no difference, in which case, he should accept it; or it makes a very big difference and on a ground that he does not want to accept, in which case, he should resist it on that ground.

Mr. McFadden: We are of the view that the amendment would not make a difference. We will reflect on it, but we cannot accept it tonight.

A number of safeguards will ensure that orders that are beyond the scope of the Bill will not be delivered. Before an order is laid, the Minister will be required to consult widely with the relevant stakeholders. In addition, the Government have undertaken not to use the order-making powers in the Bill to create highly controversial measures, or to force through orders in opposition to the Committees. We will of course hear more about that issue tomorrow.

Mr. Heath: The Minister said that he would reflect on amendment (a), and I find it difficult to understand what he will be reflecting on. But—this is the big

"but"—this is the only opportunity that this House has to express an opinion on it. He can reflect as long as he likes, but this House will not have the opportunity to express its opinion unless it does so tonight. So can he reflect a little more quickly, and perhaps accept it?

Mr. McFadden: That is a good try but, as I have said, I cannot say on the Government's behalf that we will accept the amendment tonight.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I want to make some progress, if I may.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) said that the inertia in the process since 2001 was not necessarily the fault of the Select Committees or of the degree of parliamentary scrutiny. He has a strong point; we have to look at the system in the round. There is an argument that Departments will be more reluctant to come forward with regulatory reform orders if they think that the process is so cumbersome that it will be difficult to use. So there is an argument about incentives and how the process works as a whole. But the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, who has been a voice of common sense throughout this process, and who has come up with positive and constructive proposals, made a strong point about there being not just a duty on this House to agree the proper scrutiny procedure, but a duty on Departments to pursue this agenda with vigour and enthusiasm.

8.15 pm

Mr. Chope: Does the Minister therefore accept, on his own interpretation of new clause 19, that it may well result in this procedure being used in circumstances where overall burdens will be increased, rather than decreased?

Mr. McFadden: No, I do not accept that, but it is possible for the burden on some to go up as a new deregulatory process comes into being.

We had a lengthy debate on new clause 17, mostly between Opposition Members. I tried to follow it, and I hope that I have understood the intention of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) accurately. If I am right, the purpose of his new clause is that orders made under this procedure would not be binding on our Community obligations. He said, I think, to my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) that if his new clause were accepted, infraction procedures would occur and various consequences would follow.

Mr. Cash: I did not predicate my argument on the basis that there would be infraction proceedings; rather, I said that they could be a consequence. The stability and growth pact is an example of the rule of law in Europe being destroyed by the attitudes of individual member states. What I am saying is that, where there is an Act of Parliament that is express and unambiguous, even if it is inconsistent with the European Communities Act 1972, and where the words "notwithstanding the 1972 Act" are included in such legislation, the legislative supremacy of this House requires the judiciary to give effect to that legislation. That is the simple point that I am making, and it is unchallengeable.

Mr. McFadden: It is unchallengeable in the hon. Gentleman's subjective judgment. The interesting point about new clause 17 is that it is supported by his Front-Bench colleagues, with all the inferences that will be drawn from that. The Conservative party has been re-packaged in recent months, but the point, which might be noticed beyond this debate, is that they are backing this new clause in the knowledge of what the consequences might be.

Mr. Heald: I made it clear that I should be very interested to hear the Minister's views on the new clause. Is he saying that it would change the law, or that it would simply clarify existing law? Is it not just a statement of existing law?

Mr. McFadden: It seeks to go further than our proposals on the European aspects of the Bill, which deal with gold-plating rather than trying to challenge our obligations as members of the European Union, which are a matter of fact.

Mr. Cash: As with the arguments—on which at last the Prime Minister has given way—on the Human Rights Act 1998 in the context of the sovereignty of Parliament and the role of the judiciary, so, in different circumstances but on the same principle, the legislative supremacy of Parliament applies in the context of the European Community. Does the Minister agree with that or not?

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman proves my point.

I should like to turn to some of the other comments made towards the end of our debate. The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) mentioned the Scotland Act 1998. The Bill would have the same relationship to that Act as to the Regulatory Reform Act 2001, in the sense that consequential provisions could be made, as set out in clause 8.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) asked about tax. The answer is that orders could be used to reduce tax if that met the purpose of removing burdens and other provisions in the Bill. In reality, however, there is a Budget and a Finance Bill every year, and that is how we deal with tax measures in this House. I hope that that makes the matter clear.

Kelvin Hopkins: As I said, all taxation issues can be dealt with in the Finance Bill every year, and there is no real necessity to include them in this Bill.

Mr. McFadden: Here we come to the question of what regulatory reform orders are likely to be used for. My hon. Friend is right—there is a Budget and a Finance Bill every year precisely for the purposes of making changes to taxation.

Several hon. Members asked for examples of what the Bill will allow us to do. One example is that of the Charity Commission deregulation, which was undertaken to review the financial thresholds at which certain registration requirements are asked for. Others may include simplifying some transactions with Government, consolidating areas of overlapping legislation, Hampton mergers of regulatory bodies, and streamlining overlapping consent regimes. For instance, the Department of Health wishes to remove a consent regime introduced in the Health Act 1999 because it has proved ineffective, and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister undertook to consider proposals for reviewing, repealing and modifying numerous consent regimes with a view to removing burdens on the NHS, local authorities and others.

[Mr. McFadden]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Since this regulatory reform Bill has itself undergone considerable regulatory reform so far, will it, if it becomes an Act, be a candidate for regulatory reform under its own provisions, so that it is another example of a future Act that needs to be reformed?

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman anticipates amendments that we will reach later in the debate. I shall resist outlining those provisions now, as we have that joy to come.

In the end, we have to make a judgment as to whether we want a deregulatory system that can do the job. New clause 19, with its associated amendments, was our response to fears that the Government were introducing too wide a power. Equally, there is a warning on the other side of the debate. If we legislate on the basis of every scenario in our wildest imaginings about what this legislation may be used for, we will end up with a repeat of the process that we have had twice before, which has achieved a consensus in Parliament but not the purpose that we wished.

I shall end by reflecting on what my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston, the Chairman of the Regulatory Reform Committee said. It has been suggested in the debate that the Bill is about relieving the burdens on Ministers. That is not the intention of the legislation. Those who feel the burdens are the people and bodies outside the House, including charities, businesses, and voluntary and public sector organisations. They have to deal with the regulation and legislation that we introduce. It is they who feel the effects, and it is to them that we have a duty to regulate in such a way that the power can be used effectively.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During the debate, several hon. Members on both sides of the House have said that their view of new clause 19, on which we are about to vote, could be affected by knowing whether a Division was likely to be available on either amendment (a) or amendment (b). Are you in a position to give the House any guidance on whether such a Division might be possible?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have listened carefully to the debate, and I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. If amendment (a) were pressed to a vote, I would accede to a Division on it.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 20

POWER TO PROMOTE REGULATORY PRINCIPLES

'(1) A Minister of the Crown may by order under this section make any provision which he considers would serve the purpose in subsection (2).

(2) That purpose is securing that regulatory functions are exercised so as to comply with the principles in subsection (3).

(3) Those principles are that—

(a) regulatory activities should be carried out in a way which is transparent, accountable, proportionate and consistent;

(b) regulatory activities should be targeted only at cases in which action is needed.

(4) Subject to this Part, the provision that may be made under subsection (1) for the purpose in subsection (2) includes—

(a) provision modifying the way in which a regulatory function is exercised by any person,

(b) provision amending the constitution of a body exercising regulatory functions which is established by or under an enactment,

(c) provision transferring, or providing for the transfer or delegation of, the regulatory functions conferred on any person,

(d) provision creating a new body to which, or a new office to the holder of which, functions are transferred under paragraph (c),

(e) provision abolishing a body or office established by or under an enactment, and provision made by amending or repealing any enactment.

(5) An order under this section may contain such consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provision (including provision made by amending or repealing any enactment or other provision) as the Minister making it considers appropriate.

(6) An order under this section may bind the Crown.

(7) An order under this section must be made in accordance with this Part.'. —[Mr. McFadden.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. McFadden: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 20, together with new clause 19, will amend the order-making power in part 1 to focus on better regulation objectives. New clause 20 will provide a power for a Minister, by order, to make provision that he considers will ensure that regulatory functions are exercised so as to comply with the Better Regulation Task Force's five principles of good regulation, which state that regulatory activities must be carried on in a way that is transparent, accountable, proportionate, consistent and should be targeted only at cases in which action is needed.

Mr. Heald: The Minister may find it helpful if I indicate that we are supportive of new clause 20, and do not feel that he need outline such a sensible measure at huge length.

Mr. McFadden: Having sat through what we have sat through this afternoon, I quite appreciate what the hon. Gentleman is saying.

Making regulatory functions more consistent with those principles is in line with the recommendations in Philip Hampton's 2005 report that regulators should conduct their business in ways that are risk-based. The Hampton report proposed that the principle of risk assessment should be entrenched in regulators so that the burden of enforcement falls on the highest risk businesses and least on those with the best record of compliance.

Although the Hampton report found that there is much good practice in UK regulation, the proposed order-making power in new clause 20 could be used to effect real further improvement. For example, the report found that fewer than half of the regulators in the Hampton review used risk assessment to reduce enforcement activity on high performing businesses. By being able to make provision modifying the way in which regulatory functions are exercised, the Government could begin to propose improvements that would ensure that more inspection is proportionate to risk and consistent. That would have a real effect on those regulated, because the burden of inspection would be reduced on the vast majority of the regulated and would be focused on the cases in which there was a real problem. New clause 20 would allow a Minister by order to modify the way in which a regulatory function is exercised, to secure that regulatory functions are carried out in accordance with the five principles.

Rob Marris: Would new clause 20 enable a Minister of the Crown, with the safeguards that we hope will be in the Bill, to get rid of some of the many quangos?

Mr. McFadden: Certainly the merger of regulators is an element of the Bill and is possible under the Bill.

One example may be that a regulator could have regard to the views of a body that represented consumers in that area—such as the Gas and Electricity Consumer Council—so that the regulator's activities are carried out in a way that is more accountable to consumers.

New clause 20 would also allow a Minister by order to amend the constitution of a body exercising regulatory functions under an enactment if doing so would make it more transparent and accountable. An example could be amending the statute governing a regulator to provide that it has a board structure, with perhaps a proportion of the board being comprised of non-executive directors, to improve accountability and transparency. It would also be possible by order to transfer the regulatory functions of one regulator to another. That power could be used where two regulators exercise oversight of related areas. For instance, where two regulators are operating in closely related areas, to make their work more transparent to the regulated and more proportionate to risk, it may be appropriate to transfer the functions of two regulators to a single regulator.

Mr. Heath: Will the Minister explain to me, because I am not absolutely clear about this point, how new clause 20 relates to clause 23, which excludes some regulators from provisions? I mention that only because he mentioned gas and electricity consumer groups and, of course, the Gas and Electricity Markets Authority is one of those specifically excluded from the principles underlying the Bill.

Mr. McFadden: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will come back to that at the end of my remarks.

New clause 20 would also permit the creation of a new body to carry out the functions of existing regulators if the Minister considered that that would be for the purpose of securing that regulatory functions were exercised so as to comply with the five principles.

Finally, if as a consequence of the creation of a new body or the transferral of a function, another regulatory body becomes obsolete, it may be necessary to abolish it. That, too, would be possible under the order-making power of new clause 20, if the Minister considers that it will ensure that regulatory functions are exercised so as to comply with the five principles of good regulation. It is important that I make it clear at this point that, under new clause 20, an order may propose changes to a body carrying out regulatory functions only if those functions continue to be exercised. Any modification by order of the functions themselves would have to be dealt with under new clause 19, or by way of primary legislation. I assure hon. Members that it is not in any way our intention to erode the independence from Government of those regulators set up by statute. Our aim with this new clause is to have an order-making power that can be used to ensure that all regulators conduct their business in a way that is consistent with the five better regulation principles.

An order made under new clause 20 will of course be subject to the same checks and balances as any other. Such an order must meet the preconditions in clause 3, and a Minister must consult widely on any proposed order.

A full explanatory document will be submitted to relevant parliamentary Committees. The Government have also given an undertaking that they will not do anything highly controversial using an order and that an order will not be forced through despite opposition from the relevant parliamentary Committees. As we will discuss tomorrow, the Government have placed on a statutory footing a veto for relevant Committees of either House. That will provide further assurance for those concerned that an order will proceed only if the informed view of the House and another place is satisfied that its outcome is desirable.

Let me turn to the question asked by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). Clause 23 excludes certain economic regulators from being specified by order for the purposes of clauses 20 and 21, which relate to the principles and the code. Those regulators are not excluded from new clause 20. I hope that that clarifies the situation, and I ask hon. Members to accept the new clause.

Mr. Heald: We welcome new clause 20, which, as the Minister said, is designed to promote the regulatory principles that derive from the Hampton review and the five principles of better regulation. There is clearly a role for merging regulators, and there is a proposal to merge 35 national regulators into seven. However, if changes to the role of a major regulator might impact on the public or have a great effect on business, it should be possible for full parliamentary scrutiny to take place. When the former Minister addressed that matter in Committee, I understood that he gave an assurance that that would happen. However, subject to that point, we welcome the new clause as a step in the right direction.

Mr. Heath: I hope that I can also be relatively brief because I support new clause 20. I had intended to be even briefer, but after hearing the Minister's reply to my intervention, I am struggling to reconcile what the new clause says with the provisions of clauses 20 and 21. The Minister must correct me if I have misunderstood him, but he told us that although clause 23 excludes certain regulators from the provisions of clauses 20 and 21, those regulators are not excluded from the provisions of new clause 20.

We said in Committee that it was an anomaly that the specified regulators were excluded from clause 20, which says:

"Any person exercising a regulatory function to which this section applies must have regard to the principles in subsection (2) in the exercise of the function ... Those principles are that ... (a) regulatory activities should be carried in a way which is transparent, accountable, proportionate and consistent; ... (b) regulatory activities should be targeted only at cases in which action is needed."

Sharp-witted Members will have realised that those words also appear in new clause 20. That measure will require a Minister to secure that regulatory functions are exercised by bodies in such as way as to comply with those precise principles, although certain regulators are excluded from those requirements as the Bill stands. There is thus a group of regulators that apparently does not need to comply with those principles by virtue of clause 23, but is required to do so by virtue of new clause 20, which the Minister will be able to use to ensure that regulatory functions are exercised in such a way that they comply with those principles. That seems to be an anomaly, albeit not an unwelcome one because at least the principles are there somewhere. Nevertheless, the anomaly might need to be sorted out at a later stage.

Mr. Heald: Clause 20(3) says that the duty to follow the principles

"is subject to any other requirement affecting the exercise of the regulatory function."

As we said in Committee, that would exclude the Financial Services Authority to some extent and other financial regulators if confidentiality is important. However, it may still apply to them subject to that modification. I wonder whether that is what the Minister is saying.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman rightly draws attention to subsection (3), but it only complicates matters further. We are not clear, because of the way in which procedure works, where the new clause will sit in the Bill. Perhaps the Minister will be able to tell us because it is a basic question. I am assuming that it forms part of part 1, but it may be part of part 2. I think the Minister nods to say that it would be in part 1, in which case we have one provision in part 1 and something that could be construed as a different provision in part 2.

I do not think that that matters so long as everyone understands exactly what applies to them. I fear that there will be confusion unless an explanatory note is produced, so that we all understand how the measure works before it gets to another place. Otherwise, I can foresee at least a day's debate on the misapplication of the new clause and existing clause 23.

Mr. McFadden: On that note, I am happy to offer the hon. Gentleman an explanatory note.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 21

POWER TO IMPLEMENT LAW COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

'(1) A Minister of the Crown may by order under this section make any provision which he considers would serve the purpose in subsection (2).

(2) That purpose is the implementation of recommendations of any one or more of the United Kingdom Law Commissions, with or without changes.

(3) In this Part "the United Kingdom Law Commissions" means—

(a) the Law Commission;

(b) the Scottish Law Commission; and

(c) the Northern Ireland Law Commission.

(4) Subject to this Part, the provision that may be made under subsection (1) includes—

(a) provision amending or abolishing any rule of law,

(b) provision codifying rules of law,

(c) provision conferring functions on any person (including functions of legislating or functions relating to the charging of fees),

(d) provision modifying the functions conferred on any person by any enactment,

(e) provision transferring, or providing for the transfer or delegation of, the functions conferred on any person by any enactment,

(f) provision abolishing a body or office established by or under an enactment, and provision made by amending or repealing any enactment.

(5) An order under this section may contain such consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provision (including provision made by amending or repealing any enactment or other provision) as the Minister making it considers appropriate.

(6) An order under this section may bind the Crown.

(7) An order under this section must be made in accordance with this Part.'.—[Bridget Prentice.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment (a) to new clause 21, in line 4, leave out 'with or without changes'.

Amendment (b) to new clause 21, in line 4, leave out 'with or without changes' and insert

'either without changes or with such changes as are necessary to take into acount any development in the law since the time the recommendations were made.'.

New clause 10—Law Commission recommendations—

'(1) In section [Power to implement Law Commission recommendations], "recommendations of any one or more of the United Kingdom Law Commissions" means proposals in the form of a draft Bill or draft Order, which do not relate to—

(a) the creation of a new offence that is punishable, or increases the penalty for an existing offence so that it is punishable—

(i) on indictment, with imprisonment exceeding thirty months; or

(ii) on summary conviction, with imprisonment exceeding the normal maximum term or a fine exceeding Level 5 on the Standard scale.

(b) authorisation of forcible entry, search and seizure,

(c) family law and rights of occupation,

(d) landlord and tenant law, in so far as it affects the rights of tenants.'.

Amendment No. 3, in page 1, Clause 1, leave out lines 8 and 9 and insert—

'(b) implementing recommendations of any one or more of the United Kingdom Law Commissions, either without changes or with such changes as are necessary to take into account any development in the law since the time the recommendations were made.'.

Government amendments Nos. 23, 27, 33, 34, 40 and 59.

Bridget Prentice: New clause 21 provides a power to implement by order recommendations of any of the UK Law Commissions, with or without changes. It makes the same provision for delivering Law Commission recommendations as set out in provisions contained in clauses 1 and 2, as amended in Committee. The preconditions in clause 3 and the restrictions in the following clauses continue to apply, as does the undertaking given in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), now the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, that the power will not be used for highly controversial measures. The new clause is necessary because of the changes made to clauses 1 and 2.

Mr. Greg Knight: The Minister says that the new clause is necessary because of changes to the Bill, but why is it necessary at all in the light of Standing Order No. 59, which makes special provision for an accelerated procedure to take place in the House for Law Commission Bills?

Bridget Prentice: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his comments. As Chair of the Procedure Committee, has, I know, taken a detailed look at the Bill. I am interested in his remarks and would be prepared to reflect on them. However, it is not always appropriate to do everything by Standing Order. It is better to put some things in a Bill.

It has sometimes taken too long for Governments to implement some of the proposals recommended by the Law Commission. Indeed, its report last year was fairly typical. It revealed that there were 16 accepted but unimplemented reports, with an average waiting time of more than seven years from publication to enactment. Clearly, that is not satisfactory.

Mr. Heath: Why does the hon. Lady feel that there is this long delay in implementation of Law Commission reports? Is it a lack of Bills from the Home Office or the Department for Constitutional Affairs, or is there some other reason?

Bridget Prentice: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman was able to say that with a straight face. As he knows very well, parliamentary time for Bills from a variety of Departments is likely to be precious and it is difficult for space to be made for them. That is one reason why it is important that the Bill allows for the opportunity for Law Commission recommendations to be brought before Parliament in a speedier fashion. That is the very purpose of new clause 21. After all, Law Commissions are by their nature generally apolitical, so it is not that easy to win parliamentary time. That is one reason why proposals might otherwise not be enacted for very many years. That is not good, because people and businesses are not able to benefit from the considered proposals that the Law Commissions have made. For those reasons, I recommend the new clause to the House.

If I may, I shall refer to the amendments to the new clause and explain to the House why I must ask it to resist them. The problem with amendment (a), which is intended to restrict the scope of the order-making power to implement Law Commission recommendations by ensuring that Ministers cannot change those recommendations in any way if they wish to use the order-making power, is that it is too restrictive. It would not allow any changes to the recommendations. The words "with or without changes" introduce a degree of flexibility into new clause 21. The new clause would therefore avoid the loss of good measures by reason of quibbling arguments that a change is beyond a particular technical parameter, while still preserving the overall rule that the order in question must implement a Law Commission recommendation and not something different from that.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I wish to draw the Minister's attention to subsection (5), which states:

"An order under this section may contain such consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provision (including provision made by amending or repealing any enactment or other provision) as the Minister making it considers appropriate."

She said that omitting "with or without changes" would permit dealing with quibbling matters, but subsection (5) deals with the very issue to which she refers.

Bridget Prentice: Subsection (5) does indeed go a long way to achieving what we want to achieve, but it is important that we include in the Bill the fact that amendments to Law Commission recommendations may need to be made. The most obvious example of when that might be necessary, which my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire gave in Committee, is following a time lapse such as we have discussed, during which other things may have taken place that mean that a recommendation no longer fits the purpose for which it was intended. In that case, changes would have to be made. Amendment (a) would stifle that use.

My hon. Friend also said in Committee that the words "with or without changes" are not intended to allow Ministers to make proposals that would turn recommendations into something completely different. If proposals are so far removed from the recommendations that they would not, in fact, implement them, under new clause 21 the proposal should not be proceeded with. I would imagine that the Scrutiny Committee would be quick to ensure that that were brought to the House's attention under the new veto provisions to be introduced in the Bill.

The 2001 Act included numerous technical restrictions that created arbitrary limits on what could be delivered by order. The order-making powers created by the Bill should be flexible enough to achieve the effective delivery of beneficial Law Commission recommendations, which are an important part of the better regulation agenda. The correct approach is not to rule out changes but to allow proposals to be considered by the Committees. If they do not agree that the proposals implement Law Commission recommendations or satisfy the pre-conditions in clause 3 that provide important protection for people's rights, they can veto the order. We may, for example, need a power to make changes before the Law Commission recommendations become legislation. There may be scope for drafting or structural changes if the Government decide to adopt only some of the proposals in a Bill drafted by the commission. It is often necessary to make amendments to reflect changes in the law after a Committee reports. It may be desirable, too, to make material changes to the detail after further consideration or a suggestion from a scrutiny Committee. In response to the question from the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke), subsection (5) would not cover all those possibilities. In summary, amendment (a) is unduly restrictive, as it would introduce sterile and time wasting arguments about form and language. We want a procedure that delivers better regulation, not one that absorbs resources in arid legal arguments over technicalities. I therefore cannot support amendment (a), so I hope that the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) will withdraw it.

Amendment (b) is slightly more generous than amendment (a), and is substantially the same as amendment No. 3. It would allow Ministers to change recommendations if it is necessary to take into account any development in the law since the recommendations were made, as I said earlier. It builds the case for such a change—the longer the delay between the publication of the Law Commission recommendations and the delivery of the order, the more likely it is that the law will have to be changed. In such cases, it is no longer sensible to implement the recommendations without changes, because in certain respects they may be out of date. It is important to be able to implement the recommendations with the changes necessary to reflect changes in the law.

To that extent, I welcome the policy underlying amendment (b). However, it, too, is excessively restrictive. There may be other reasons why changes are necessary or desirable. It may be possible to improve the drafting of the draft legislation proposed by the Law Commission, not least when part of a group of recommendations is to be implemented or several sets of recommendations are drawn together in a single instrument.

David Howarth: I do not want to cast aspersions on the abilities of parliamentary counsel, but I doubt whether they can draft better than the Law Commission. Any conceivable circumstance in which changes need to be made is surely covered by amendment (b) or new clause 21(5). I cannot see that there is room for anything beyond those two measures.

Bridget Prentice: I have no intention of refereeing between parliamentary counsel and the Law Commission to decide who employs the better draftspeople. Any drafting changes made by the commission to draft legislation would be subject to consultation, and it could reflect on the responses.

A Minister may wish to make a material change. Provided that the order remains an order to implement Law Commission recommendations, they should be able to do so. The change proposed might be as a result of consultation after the publication of the report. It might be that a change is proposed to make the recommendations of the commission more generally accepted. Indeed, as I said earlier, the scrutiny Committees themselves might wish some changes to be made. The correct approach is not to rule out changes, but to allow the proposals to be considered by the Committees. For that reason, I ask the House to resist amendment (b) to new clause 21.

Pete Wishart: Can the Minister confirm that, in new clause 21, the reference to the Scottish Law Commission relates only to issues that are reserved to the Westminster Parliament under the Scotland Act 1998? That is suggested in new clause 21 and in clause 8, but nowhere in the Bill is it specifically stated.

Bridget Prentice: I will reflect on the hon. Gentleman's question. It is my understanding that the measure will apply to all the UK Law Commissions. They would all be subject to this part of the Bill.

Rob Marris: On my hon. Friend's answer to the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart), it is not clear to me, particularly since new clause 22 has not been selected, whether new clause 21 would apply to the Northern Ireland Law Commission, which is specifically not mentioned in subsection (3), although it was mentioned in clause 1 of the original Bill.

Bridget Prentice: New clause 21(3) specifies the Law Commission, the Scottish Law Commission and the Northern Ireland Law Commission. I hope that that answers the questions from both my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) and the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart).

New clause 10 would rule out the creation of certain new offences and the authorisation of forcible entry, search and seizure. These were possible under clauses 6 and 7. However, Government amendments Nos. 23 and 27 will achieve the same result, so that orders implementing Law Commission recommendations will not have any special treatment in this respect, and the limits in clauses 6 and 7 will apply to these orders, as well as to others. To that extent new clause 10 has been overtaken by events.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The hon. Lady referred specifically to forcible entry, search and seizure. Does her caveat apply to all the other categories covered in the new clause?

Bridget Prentice: I shall come to the Government amendments that apply to those categories in a moment. For clarification, may I say to the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire that he is right. Where matters are devolved, the provision would not apply. It applies only to Westminster legislation that has effect in Scotland.

Mr. Heald: With reference to Scotland, the Minister may be aware that the Law Society of Scotland has pointed out that there is an implied assumption in new clause 21 that all Law Commission and Scottish Law Commission reports and recommendations are non-controversial and may be enacted using the procedure under the Bill. It goes on to state that that is "not necessarily so". Does she accept that some of the measures that the Law Commissions examine are quite controversial?

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman is right. Many of the issues that the Law Commission deals with are controversial. That is one of the reasons why, as an independent apolitical body, it is particularly useful to us in the House for examining those very issues. I have no quibble at all with the idea that some of the issues are controversial. To reassure the Law Society of Scotland, I point out that where issues are controversial, as has been said in earlier debates today and as was said in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire, it would not be the Government's intention to put through this system any measure that was particularly controversial. I hope that gives the House some reassurance.

Secondly, new clause 10 would prevent any order from implementing Law Commission recommendations in the area of family law and rights of occupation or landlord and tenant law in that it relates to the rights of tenants. The Government feel that this is too restrictive because not every proposal is unsuitable for implementation by order. Such blanket prohibitions would create new boundaries. We would need to define family law and the other topics that have been mentioned. We would create, once again, technical limits that have little to do with the merits of the proposal or its suitability for the procedure.

Some family law and landlord and tenant law proposals would be far too contentious to proceed with other than by primary legislation. The Government have made it clear—I make it clear again this evening—that we will not use the procedure for highly controversial measures. The correct approach is not to rule out reform but to allow proposals to come forward to be considered by the scrutiny Committees. New clause 10 would unnecessarily limit our power and, on that basis, I cannot support it.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is there not a weakness in the argument that it is the Government who will determine whether something is highly controversial, in which case the procedure would not be used, or whether something is just controversial, in which case the procedure may be used?

Bridget Prentice: I do not intend to dance on a pin on the difference between highly controversial and controversial. I do not think that controversial issues, as in those terms, would proceed under this system.

The scrutiny Committees would have reached a strong decision if they felt that something was controversial and should not be subject to the order-making mechanism. The Government have made it clear that they would take that into account.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I do not want to get into a philosophical debate about the angels on the head of a pin, but what criteria are to be used to define "controversial"?

Bridget Prentice: There are no criteria to define "controversial" other than according to what we understand in our everyday lives and the usage of the word. I am sure that my hon. Friend was involved in issues in the past that were judged to be highly controversial which are now accepted as being relatively mainstream. My hon. Friend may not appreciate my describing anything that he has done as being mainstream, but he will understand my point that things change. On that basis, we have to be able to define what is controversial now and what might be controversial tomorrow. That is quite difficult.

Mr. Gale: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Bridget Prentice: I would like to move on but I will take one more intervention.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to the Minister.

Hitherto in these arguments the Government have discarded arguments about reasonableness because reasonableness is difficult to define. That has been the Government's stance. Why should we not apply the same yardstick to the issue before us? Why should it be left to the Government and the Law Commission to decide what is controversial and what is not?

Bridget Prentice: The argument is not left purely to the Government. The scrutiny Committees will have a view. It is not the Government who decide what is controversial. I do not think that it would be possible to find a satisfactory legislative definition of controversial, unlike reasonableness. The reasonableness test is well known in law. Judicial review is an opportunity for people to test the reasonableness of a Minister's decision.

I will give an example. A 1990s report on divorce and the current project on homicide are plainly unsuitable for implementation by order because people have strong feelings about the principles that they address. Therefore, it would not be appropriate to take them through the proposed system. Equally obviously, other reforms are uncontroversial, often technical "lawyers' law" reforms; very important, but politically unexciting. Those are the ones that often struggle to find parliamentary time.

Amendment No. 3 builds on one possible reason why a change may be necessary. Indeed, the longer the delay between publication of the Law Commission's recommendations and the order being delivered, the more likely, as I said earlier, that the law will have to be changed. So it is important to be able to implement the recommendations with the changes necessary to reflect changes in the law. I will not go over the arguments again, because I explained in respect of earlier amendments the reasons why such an approach would be too restrictive.

I hope that the House welcomes Government amendment No. 23, which relates to the limits, already contained in clause 6, on the criminal penalties that can be imposed by order. Currently, these restrictions do not apply to orders implementing Law Commission recommendations. The amendment will make orders implementing such recommendations subject to the same limits on maximum criminal penalties to which all other orders are subject. In Committee, the Government agreed to reflect on amendments that proposed deleting the exception relating to criminal penalties imposed by orders implementing Law Commission recommendations. That exception was created to allow orders implementing Law Commission recommendations, notwithstanding the level of penalties proposed. That caused some concern in Committee, even though it seemed likely that the exception would be little used. We have therefore given careful consideration to that concern during the Bill's passage.

The Government have always intended that the order-making power should work as an effective vehicle for delivering regulatory reform measures, while maintaining necessary protections and safeguards. I hope that Government amendment No. 23 reassures Members that the Bill's order-making power will be used to implement only appropriate measures by order, and that, on that basis, they will be willing to accept it.

Government amendment No. 27 relates to the limits already in clause 7 prohibiting the authorisation by order of forcible entry, search, seizure or the compelling of the giving of evidence. Currently, those restrictions do not apply to orders implementing Law Commission recommendations. The amendment will make orders implementing such recommendations subject to the general prohibition on authorising by order forcible entry, search, seizure or the compelling of the giving of evidence. We agreed in Committee to reflect on amendments that proposed deleting the exception for orders implementing Law Commission recommendations, and I hope that Government amendment No. 27 offers the same level of reassurance that the Bill's order-making power will be used to implement only appropriate measures by order.

Government amendments Nos. 33, 34, 40 and 59 are consequential drafting amendments, so I do not propose to discuss them in detail. Suffice it to say that Government amendment No. 33 is made necessary by the amendments to clauses 1 and 2, but it does not change the effect of clause 11(1)(d). Government amendment No. 34 is also made necessary by amendments to clauses 1 and 2, and does not change the effect of clause 11(2). Government amendment No. 40, also made necessary by amendments to clauses 1 and 2, does not change the effect of clause 12(4). Finally, Government amendment No. 59 replaces the now obsolete reference to "section 1(4)" with a reference to subsection (3) of new clause 21.

On that basis, I commend the new clause and the amendments to the House.

Mr. Heald: New clause 21 would enable a Minister to make orders to implement

"recommendations of…the…Law Commissions, with or without changes."

I accept that the Law Commissions are very important, responsible and respectable bodies, and there is no doubt that too few of their recommendations have become law, but one cannot deny that they consider some important and controversial areas. The Minister touched on tenants' rights, provocation in the law of murder and other areas. The question is not the Minister's motives, about which I have not the slightest doubt—[Interruption.] I heard something sotto voce which I will not repeat. Bearing in mind the ability of Ministers to change recommendations, if a Minister did not agree with the full Law Commission proposal, expanded it and wished to continue with it, there is nothing in the Bill that would entitle the House to have the full debate and scrutiny that it would wish for. In those circumstances, I cannot be satisfied with what is proposed.

New clause 10, which I do not intend to press, would have limited the extent of orders based on the Law Commission recommendations. I welcome the Minister's amendments Nos. 23 and 27, which to some extent deal with the point that was made in Committee.

Mr. Greg Knight: Before my hon. Friend moves off this point, will he reflect on my point about Standing Order No. 59, which allows for an accelerated procedure in this House for Law Commission proposals? That Standing Order was introduced under the last Conservative Government but has not been used by this Government since 1999, so whose fault is it if a lot of Law Commission reports are gathering dust?

Mr. Heald: As ever, my right hon. Friend makes a telling point. The advantage of the Standing Orders route, if I can put it in that way, is that it has within it the flexibility either to move the Bill through swiftly or, if the House is concerned, to take it through the various stages in our normal way, including a proper Committee stage and Report.

I do not think that we have quite got there on the question of how to tackle Law Commission Bills. I would be only too happy to sit down with the Minister and other colleagues, if required, to consider how we might better approach it and build on what the Standing Orders already provide.

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) tabled amendment (a) in his capacity as Chairman of the Procedure Committee. Removing the words, "with or without changes", would put Ministers in a position whereby they could not expand on what the Law Commission had suggested, which would be a good thing. If it reached the point where the Minister had had a bit of delay and it was necessary to make some change to what the Law Commission had recommended, I am sure that Sir Roger Toulson and his committee would be only too happy to be speedy about it and to turn it round, because I know how frustrated they are that they do not get their measures put through. None of these problems is insuperable, but pushing through controversial changes by order without proper protections is not the way forward for the House.

The veto that the Minister mentioned currently exists in a very restrictive form. It does not mean that a Committee can look at a piece of legislation and say, "No, that is not suitable for the order-making power." It says to the Committee, "If you go through these very rigid steps which are set out in the second part of the veto, you will be able to block the measure." That is not good enough. If we believe in Select Committees and want to empower them, we should trust them.

Without some serious concession on the veto and perhaps something in Standing Orders as well, I am not satisfied with new clause 21, but if it is passed by the House, I will support my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire and his Select Committee in their amendment (a).

Andrew Miller: Having listened carefully to what my hon. Friend the Minister said, I think that she reflects very sensibly the desire of the Law Commission and this House to make progress on some of the less controversial issues. Clearly, we have to reflect carefully on how we deal with the more controversial ones. I fully endorse the Opposition spokesman's view that this leads us to reflect on what kind of veto the House has, where it can be exercised and by whom. There is a very important point that I invite my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to reflect on before we reach the section on the veto. While I am minded fully to support the principles set out in the new clauses that we are dealing with, I am predicating my remarks on a veto of similar power to that which existed in respect of the 2001 legislation, but on the face of the Bill. The ministerial understanding was one that the House would not tolerate being broken; I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree with that. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) is right to say that the Government have proposed a veto, but the qualifications that are being proposed create problems for us.

I want to make a few quick observations on the important contribution made by my hon. Friend the Minister. First, her remarks need to be looked at in the context of the commitment given to the Chairman of the Procedure Committee and me by the previous Minister in the Cabinet Office, my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), that there would be significant changes to the Standing Orders available to the House.

I hope that my second observation will take some of the sting out of hon. Members' concerns. Clause 16 contains provisions that will enable the House to require the Minister to have regard to representations from the outside, as well as any resolution of either House or any recommendations by a Committee of either House charged with dealing with a draft order. On that basis, I believe that new clause 21 makes eminent sense, because the protections are there. However, amendment (b), tabled by the Liberal Democrats, also makes sense. Some of the issues that the Law Commission deals with have gathered dust over a number of years, for the reasons that the Chairman of the Procedure Committee outlined, as well as for many other complex reasons. It might be sensible to make provision for such eventualities, as proposed in amendment (b), although I do not think that amendment (a) is necessary, because of provisions contained elsewhere in the legislation.

Rob Marris: Would not amendment (b) result in our ending up having endless debates on what "necessary" meant?

Andrew Miller: In his previous occupation, my hon. Friend spent many a long hour arguing about the meaning of words such as "necessary" and "reasonable" in front of learned courts, and no doubt getting paid considerably more than he is now. Such arguments are among the regular problems that Parliament has to face.

Without getting into a tirade about lawyers and their earnings, my final point is that the Bill will contain a veto. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the nature of the veto is mission-critical to ensuring that the spirit of my hon. Friend's remarks can be adhered to throughout the passage of an order. Assuming that the assurances given are delivered on, and with the caveat expressed about the second part of the Liberal Democrat amendment, the new clause ought to be accepted.

9.45 pm

Mr. Heath: The intervention from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) drew attention to the words "necessary" and "reasonable". I have always felt that I am necessary and reasonable and that what I want to put into a Bill is necessary and reasonable, although I understand that that might engender debate. In this instance, we need not be very concerned.

There should be a mechanism for getting Law Commission proposals into law expeditiously and effectively. The first difficulty is ensuring that it is not abused to bring forward matters that are not non-controversial in any way, but that have important impacts with which many would disagree. The second difficulty is avoiding a Government either amending or cherry-picking those proposals along the way, so that what is enacted is different from what the Law Commission proposed. The third is ensuring that, wherever possible, a primary legislative route is used in preference to an order of this kind. I take seriously the point made by the Chairman of the Procedure Committee about the application, or lack of application, of Standing Orders. It seems preposterous that the Government say that they have had no opportunity to enact the long queue of Law Commission proposals when they have not used the mechanisms available in the House to do that.

It beggars belief to say that there is a lack of legislative opportunity to introduce Law Commission proposals, especially with regard to criminal law, but even with regard to civil law. There is a criminal justice Bill every single year, as I know to my cost because I have served on the Standing Committees on most of them. There is an immigration and asylum Bill every year, without fail. Sometimes, a couple of terrorism Bills are introduced in a single year. There is a queue of legislation coming from the Home Office and the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and it does not take a great deal of ingenuity to attach Law Commission proposals to those Bills. Everything else is attached—criminal justice Bills often look like Christmas trees with the number of baubles attached because they are thought worthy of a few column inches in one of the papers.

There are other difficulties. When is a Law Commission recommendation a Law Commission recommendation? I never had that satisfactorily explained by the Minister in Committee. Is it the original recommendations, the draft Bill that the Law Commission will produce, or either one? If it is the recommendations, the point made by the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice) about a difference in drafting between parliamentary counsel and the Law Commission is of no importance whatever, as the recommendations are what matter. We need clarity on that.

With regard to amendments (a) and (b) to the new clause, we are still wary about giving Ministers the capacity to introduce changes to Law Commission proposals. We asked time after time in Committee why the Minister needed that power. He repeated five times—I have looked at Hansard to confirm it—that he needed the power for one reason only: to deal with a situation in which a Law Commission proposal had been hanging around for some time, there had been a substantive development in the law since the time when the recommendation was made, and there was a need to reflect that. That is why we formulated our amendment (b) exactly as the Minister had said at the time that he wanted it to be formulated. We formulated it in that way to meet his requirements: we had no other reason to do so.

Some Governments are very hard to please. They tell us exactly what they want, we table an amendment to that effect, and then they want something completely different. There are other reasons for which they want to be able to change recommendations, and it is those other reasons that give us cause for alarm in this instance. If the intention is to implement some recommendations and not others, that may completely change the complexion of what the Law Commission proposes. Is the Minister proposing to cherry-pick certain proposals? Are proposals going to be tweaked to make them more acceptable to Ministers or, indeed, Select Committees? I have worries about that as well. The issue should be put before the House so that everyone has a choice to take part in the discussion, not just a select few.

If the Bill is to contain the mechanism described by the Minister for the fast-tracking of Law Commission proposals—there are new caveats that I welcome, given their applicability to later amendments—it must also incorporate amendment (b), which limits the ability to change the recommendations in a way that the Minister specifically identified in Committee as a necessary prerequisite for effective working of the legislation.

If the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), presses his amendment, we will support him. I merely ask him to reflect on whether our amendment would not only do the same as his, but allow a small concession to Ministers in the context of what they sought in Committee. In the light of that, he may prefer to support our amendment. In any event, the House should divide on one of the amendments. I must add that if the Procedure Committee, a Select Committee of the House, is to be ignored by Ministers, it sets a poor precedent for the working of the Bill.

Mr. Knight: This is not a party-political issue. It is really a matter of judgment. I have reached the conclusion that new clause 21 is not the answer, and I hope that the Minister will reflect on what has been said this evening and will withdraw it. If she is not prepared to do so, the new clause will be rendered less offensive if the House accepts amendment (a), which incidentally has cross-party support. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow a Division on the amendment.

As has been said, new clause 21 seeks to facilitate the implementation of Law Commission recommendations by using a fast-track procedure under the Bill "with or without changes". The Minister objects to the removal of those four words. According to the Minister for the Cabinet Office, the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), if time had elapsed and some of the measures had been implemented because they were deemed urgent, without the words "with or without changes" Ministers would not be able to implement the balance.

I do not buy that argument, for reasons identified by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) and the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth). Subsection (5) of the new clause states:

> "An order under this section may contain such consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provision (including provision made by amending or repealing any enactment or other provision)".

I think that the power is there.

One of the duties of the Law Commission—some would argue that it is one of its main tasks—is to codify and bring together legislation on the same subject. Why would we want to split one of its proposals between different pieces of legislation? My reading of subsection (5) is that Ministers could implement proposals that were necessary and repeal any law changes made in the interim, and codify it all under the order-making power. That seems to me to be the right way to proceed.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) said, it is incorrect to assume that a Law Commission recommendation will be uncontroversial. When my Committee took evidence, the Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), insisted on using the term "highly controversial" to describe measures to which the provision would not apply—not just controversial, but highly controversial was the description given in each case. If the Minister is saying that she has reflected on that and is willing to lower the threshold, I would be reassured.

I see no need for the provision to be in the Bill. We have two Standing Orders that could relate to the type of legislation that we have been discussing. Standing Order No. 58, which deals with consolidation measures, states that Second Readings and Third Readings of such measures will be taken forthwith; it therefore provides a much accelerated procedure. Standing Order No. 59, which the Conservatives introduced, with consent, when we were in government, specifically refers to Law Commission Bills and states that they should be referred to a Second Reading Committee. We made those changes with consent—that was how we did business then when we amended Standing Orders, and I regret that that is not what happens now. That Standing Order, which was introduced in 1995, has, I believe—I stand to be corrected by the Minister—not been used by the Government since 1999. One has to ask them why. Why have they not at least tried to use that provision to put Law Commission proposals on to the statute book?

I am not saying that those two Standing Orders are perfect, but I noted what I regard as a point of good will made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire. He said that he was prepared to engage in constructive dialogue with the Minister, perhaps on ways of changing the Standing Orders to deal with such matters. The Modernisation Committee is already examining our processes, and I know that the Procedure Committee would be prepared to consider that very point. I hope that the Minister will reflect on that with a view to not going down the proposed route and to ensuring that the House always has the opportunity, through primary legislation, to consider Law Commission proposals, albeit by an accelerated procedure.

Bridget Prentice: I, too, welcome the comments made by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald). I am always happy to enter into dialogue with him, and happy to restate that if it helps this evening's debate. However, that does not mean that I have any intention of withdrawing new clause 21. There are times when the accelerated procedures that the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) has clearly outlined are not appropriate for substantive changes to the law, as opposed to consolidating Bills. I ask him to reflect on that point.

Mr. Knight: I am disappointed to hear that. In the light of what the hon. Lady has just said, I shall be one of those seeking to divide the House on the new clause.

David Howarth: In view of the time I shall be brief and add only one point. The importance of the debate is that the Law Commission route is the only one under the Bill whereby Ministers can change the common law; otherwise their powers are restricted to changing statutes. The common law basis of our constitution is well-known; the rules of natural justice, for example, exist only in common law, not in statute.

The Government have a history of changing Law Commission recommendations. On bad character evidence, for example, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 did exactly the opposite of what the Law Commission recommended, so these are serious matters. If the Government cannot bring their desires within either subsection (5) of the new clause or the second part of amendment (b), to take advantage of the power to make changes consequent on the delay in implementing the recommendations, the only proper route is not to make use of the fast-track procedure but to go back to the Law Commission and try to persuade it to take the matter forward.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 326, Noes 133.

NORTHERN IRELAND

'An order under this Part may not, except by virtue of section (Power to remove or reduce burdens)(8), (Power to promote regulatory principles)(5) or (Power to implement Law Commission recommendations)(5), make provision to amend or repeal any Northern Ireland legislation.'.—[Hilary Armstrong.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 26

EXCEPTED ENACTMENTS

'An order under this Part may not make provision amending or repealing any provision of—

(a) this Part; or

(b) the Human Rights Act 1998 (c. 42).'. —[Hilary Armstrong.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill, as amended in the Standing Committee, to be further considered tomorrow.

Mr. Heath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you could help us. The last group of amendments for consideration today, which we did not have an opportunity to debate at all, included some very important amendments on the constitutional arrangements, particularly the application to the Scotland Act 1998 and the way in which the Bill interacts with Scottish affairs in the Scottish Parliament. Is there any opportunity to discuss those matters tomorrow, given that we have a further day on Report and that under today's timetable we have had no debate whatever of those subjects?

Mr. Speaker: There is not. Under the terms of the programme motion, to which the House agreed, that cannot be done.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 24th April, be approved.—[Mr. Roy.]

Question agreed to.

Ordered,

That the Church of England (Miscellaneous Provisions) Measure and Pastoral (Amendment) Measure, which were laid before this House on 16th February, be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Roy.]

COMMITTEES

Ordered,

That Mr Geoffrey Hoon and Liz Blackman be discharged from the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons and Mr Jack Straw and Paddy Tipping be added.—[Mr. Roy.]

Ordered,

That Peter Luff be discharged from the Administration Committee and Mr Greg Knight be added.—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Encompass Health Care Practice

10.29 pm

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): I wish to present a petition from Mrs. Elizabeth Lowrey that has been signed by more than 900 residents of Washington in Tyne and Wear and is supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson). It concerns changes to the Encompass health care practice, which offers an innovative and dynamic approach to health care in Washington, and states:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to urge the Sunderland Teaching Primary Care Trust to recognise the current benefits of allowing the existing team to achieve full independent status and continue to provide primary medical care for the community.

To lie upon the Table.

Parish Councillors

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Roy.]

10.30 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise an issue of particular concern to my constituent—I shall shortly explain his circumstances—that extends to a much wider constituency of opinion. Many people both inside and outside the House think that the time to take action to try to remedy some of the difficulties in the case is overdue.

I am grateful to the Minister for Local Government for agreeing to reply to our debate on the model code of conduct for councillors. I accept that it would be inappropriate for him to refer to the specific case of Councillor Alex Riley, but I am grateful that he will deal with the wider issues. It might be helpful if I describe the circumstances of Councillor Riley's case. For some time, he has chaired the parish council in the village of Longstanton, which is several miles north-west of Cambridge.

As a result of the last regional structure plan and the subsequent county structure plan, a large new town is to be built to the north of Longstanton and Oakington comprising 8,000 to 10,000 homes—subsequently, the local development framework settled on 8,000 homes. That large development is very close to Longstanton, and it will envelop parts of the village. It extends to the north, west and east of the village, and in the original plans it was no more than the distance of a football field from some points of the village.

As chairman of the parish council, Alex Riley was closely and actively involved in the debate about the structure plans. When it became clear that active planning on the local development framework would begin, he decided to stand for election to represent Longstanton on those issues. In June 2004, he was elected with 70 per cent. of the vote in Longstanton as an independent councillor—the House will observe that this is not a party political matter. From June 2004, he sought to represent the village's views on a range of issues in the local development framework before an outline planning application was made. However, the ethical standards officer alleged that 15 breaches of the code of conduct took place in the space of just five months. I accept that the Minister will not want to comment, but the hearing of that case took place today. It concluded that Councillor Riley was responsible for breaches of the code of conduct but a penalty was not imposed, apart from the fact that he was instructed to receive training in the code. That is ironic, given that he has become insufferably familiar with it to the point of contempt. None the less, in my view—I do not propose to speak for anyone else—those were technical breaches of the code. That is one of the main reasons no penalty has been applied.

The issue is the extent to which councillors legitimately sent to their council chamber by constituents are able to represent those constituents. The Local Government Act 2000 set out an ethical framework for councillors, including in section 30 a model code of conduct, which South Cambridgeshire district council adopted in 2002. The code identifies two interests—first, personal interests, which can be defined as anything that might be held to affect a councillor's well-being or financial position, or that of their relatives or friends, to a greater extent than it would affect the local population generally. Secondly, there are prejudicial interests—interests that are so significant that a member of the public with knowledge of the relevant facts would reasonably regard those interests as likely to prejudice the councillor's judgment of the public interest.

Those definitions are not at issue. Individually, Councillor Riley and all the other residents of Longstanton have personal and, in almost all cases, a prejudicial interest in relation to these matters. Planning decisions must, of course, be made in the public interest, but local residents have a legitimate expectation that that public interest includes and fully takes account of their views as the people most affected by a planning decision. We must ensure that that interest is properly and accurately reflected.

There is confusion in South Cambridge district council about how the code of conduct should be applied. Without going into detail, it was clear in 2004 that Councillor Riley received conflicting advice about what his personal and prejudicial interests should mean in relation to his participation in the council's discussions. In October 2005 South Cambridgeshire district council took counsel's opinion. That was necessitated by the fact that the council was coming on to examine the local development framework and an outline planning application from Gallagher, which is the promoter of the large scheme. The Minister need not declare an interest, but English Partnerships, which is part of the Department, owns much of the land on which the town is to be built.

Counsel's opinion pointed out how the district council should, in accordance with the current law, deal with the councillor. First, a councillor with a prejudicial interest would be required to withdraw whenever a meeting was held. A meeting, for these purposes, included any meeting of the authority—not just meetings that formed part of any decision-making process, but informal meetings, briefing meetings or any meeting whatsoever. Secondly, the further requirement that under the code councillors should not seek improperly to influence a matter should be interpreted to include lobbying or making any written representations to members.

The code allows dispensations, but counsel's advice to the district council was clear. The standards committee of the council could not use those dispensations to avoid adherence to the code. Counsel instanced some of the very limited circumstances to which dispensations might be applied.

When counsel was advising the planning authority about what Councillor Riley could do, he came up with three options. The first was that Councillor Riley should no longer be regarded as the route through which representations could be made by villagers, so representations could be made direct to the planning director. The second was that villagers should use another councillor who had no disqualifying interest. The third option was that Councillor Riley should resign. He would then be able to make representations as chairman of the parish council or as a private citizen.

It is curious that the use of another councillor has been the route through which the district council has proceeded. The necessity for Councillor Riley not to apply improper influence has even extended to the point where he is not allowed to discuss matters in his village with the councillor who has been nominated to be the route through which such representations are to be made. Another councillor on the parish council has been so nominated and the deadening hand of the code seems almost to be extending to the point where Councillor Riley cannot even talk to Councillor Grace, who subsequently talks to Councillor Kindersley, who is the councillor through whom their representations might come. Such is the effect of the way in which the model code has been interpreted.

You will not be surprised, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have raised the issue with the Standards Board for England. It responded helpfully in November by saying:

"The Board shares your view that the current rules can be over-restrictive...and may exclude members from discussing certain matters which their community would expect them to be addressing or even, in certain cases, where they have been elected to represent specific views. Given the changing role of most councillors, the code needs to be seen to be supporting such local advocacy and the democratic right of a community to be represented when key matters which affect that community are under discussion."

David Prince, the chief executive, went on to say:

"The Board has also further recommended that the Government should also give local authorities broader powers to grant exemptions to members with prejudicial interests who nevertheless are speaking on behalf of their constituents."

The board went on to make recommendations to Ministers that flowed from exactly the same points that were made in their letter to me. The Committee on Standards in Public Life separately has made its own recommendations to Government, and I shall quote one of them. It said:

"In planning decisions the ability of elected members to represent constituents' interests where they have personal and prejudicial interests has been unnecessarily diminished. This should be changed to give any elected member the right to speak (but not vote) for their constituents at a planning committee meeting or any other quasi-regulatory meeting."

In that sense, we are clear about the direction in which both the board and the committee see we need to go.

I wrote, of course, to the Minister. He responded helpfully in January, to making it clear that the Standards Boards had made the recommendations, which he was minded to accept. I suppose that I could have rested on that and not exposed the issue to further gaze in the House, but I wanted to use this opportunity to say that I think that the current situation is untenable. In the case of South Cambridgeshire district council, there has been the benefit of counsel's opinion. It is not an arbitrary opinion. We have arrived at the point where, not seeking improper influence, Councillor Riley can barely speak to any of his fellow councillors without it being thought to be an improper influence. He cannot even go to informal meetings, briefing meetings or information meetings in the same way as members of the public attend to ascertain what is happening. He cannot ask questions and he cannot make representations.

Across the country, I have no doubt that this is not the only example. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) raised an instance not dissimilar to it on 8 November last year. Throughout the country either councillors are unknowingly breaching the code, as Councillor Riley did in 2004, by speaking on matters where they have an interest, even if they know that they do not have to vote—many cases they have no concept of the extent to which the moral code of conduct can be interpreted as constraining them—or we have councillors throughout the country who are being excluded from discussion of the very issues that they know best and about which they have been elected to represent their constituents.

Councillor Riley and I do not expect that he should be able to vote on issues where he has a personal or prejudicial interest. He does expect to make a full declaration of interests. He expects also that his representations should be made only openly and transparently. He does not expect to undertake private lobbying or to participate in discussions after he has made his representations. He does, however, expect to have access to briefings, and to be able to ask questions and make representations in cases where his council colleagues will be making decisions. He said to me plainly that if he cannot persuade them of the merits of the argument, he will understand and accept that he has failed in his task. It is his responsibility to make the arguments.

The issue is not settled; Ministers need to make progress. The outline application for the Northstowe development, which encompasses Longstanton, has yet to be considered and determined. Circumstances such as Councillor Riley's will arise elsewhere in the country. It is important that changes to the code be made as a matter of urgency. If the code is not changed under the secondary legislation that local government legislation permits, this negation of democracy will carry on and, far from inspiring confidence in local government, the code of conduct's application will bring local government into disrepute.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): Congratulations are due to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) on bringing to the House's attention the case of his constituent, whose views have been represented. This case also raises wider issues of relevance to the hon. Gentleman's other constituents. I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for explaining my responsibilities in this regard; it is always helpful when that happens. I am conscious that whenever we debate parish matters, newspaper headlines reporting our deliberations do not scream off the presses. However, there are some 80,000 parish councils in the country, and in my experience it is wise to take these debates very seriously, because many councils rightly take a close interest in these proceedings. The issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised concerning the code of conduct apply not just to parish councillors, but to councillors across the board.

I am also grateful for the opportunity to discuss the rules of conduct for councillors in the context of the planning regime. These rules are set out in model codes of conduct for local authority members—including, of course, members of parish councils—with the aim of maintaining the highest standards of public conduct among local authority members. We consider it important to promote such standards for parish councils, as for other tiers of local government.

As has been said, it is difficult for me to comment on individual circumstances, but where allegations impinge on an individual planning application, that application could be referred to the Secretary of State or to one of her inspectors on appeal. In those circumstances, I would not wish to say anything that might subsequently prejudice the quasi-judicial appeal process.

Actively promoting high standards of behaviour among local authority members is of course an important objective for any Government. Many men and women devote their time and energy to the service of their communities, and the overwhelming majority of people elected to serve as local authority members already observe the highest standards of conduct. But it is also important to get the balance right—an issue that I will discuss in a moment.

We cannot disguise—nobody wishes to—the fact that failings occur from time to time, and given that tens of thousands of people are involved, that is going to be so. However, it is worth noting that instances of elected members falling short of the conduct expected of them are very rare indeed. Such misconduct not only harms the community that members are elected to serve; it can damage the wider reputation of local government and undermine the public's trust in, and confidence in, the system as a whole. I noted carefully the hon. Gentleman's reference to the pendulum perhaps swinging too far, as some might see it, and to that itself bringing the regime into disrepute. The need to maintain public trust is just as true for parish councils as it is for other tiers of government.

The planning system involves a considerable amount of discretion, and councillors on a planning committee may arrive at a decision based on a variety of considerations. However, the law defines that decision-making duty. Failure to act within the confines of these provisions may render the council open to legal challenge by means of judicial review. The role of an elected member on a local authority planning committee involves balancing the need to represent the interests of individual constituents and the community with the need to maintain an ethic of impartial decision making on what can be, and often are, highly controversial proposals.

In 1997, the Government committed themselves to reinvigorating local democracy, focusing on enabling councils to provide the local leadership that their communities need and to deliver the services they want. In order to tackle the need for a higher degree of public trust, we introduced a new framework under the Local Government Act 2000 to promote standards of ethical behaviour. We felt that the new framework must help to dispel public criticism about those in public life by demonstrating clearly that unethical behaviour is just as unacceptable to those who have been elected as it is to the communities that they represent.

The framework indicates the high standards that are expected and requires an explicit commitment to them. Let me remind the House that the most significant provisions of the ethical regime were: the introduction of new statutory codes of conduct; the establishment in each authority of a standards committee to provide support and guidance to members on the requirements of their local code; and the creation of what was then a new body, the Standards Board for England, to promote high standards nationally and to investigate alleged breaches of the code in an independent and consistent manner.

The codes of conduct set out the conduct that is expected of members and provide a sensible framework for handling personal interests which should ensure that, providing that they have no prejudicial interests, councillors can take part in discussions and decisions and so represent their electors to the best of their ability. From May 2002, the provisions of the codes have applied to all councillors, and any allegations that the code has been breached can be reported to the Standards Board, which can then decide whether to investigate.

The model codes provide that members have a prejudicial interest in a matter if, as the hon. Gentleman said, the interest is one that a member of the public would reasonably regard as so significant as to be likely to prejudice the member's judgment of the public interest. A member with a prejudicial interest is required to withdraw from the meeting at which the matter is discussed.

The codes also provide that members should not use their position to confer an advantage for themselves or any other person. Various further guidance documents have been issued to assist members in carrying out their roles in respect of the planning regime and the need to have regard to their own personal and prejudicial interests. Chapter 8 of the document, "Probity in Planning", which is issued by the Local Government Association, makes it clear that councillors who have openly declared a view on an application should not use their position to lobby other councillors or organise a caucus to support their position. Elsewhere in chapter 8, it is made clear that other political meetings should not be used to reach a decision in advance of the committee which will make the decision.

A document prepared by the LGA, "Member engagement in planning matters", gives similar advice. The purpose of that document is to explain to members how they can become more engaged in discussions without fettering their discretion. However, if they do, the guidance is clear. It states:

> "Members who do take an active stand in support or assistance to an application should withdraw from the planning committee deliberations. Responding to lobbying is fully legitimate where a councillor openly admits an interest in the outcome of deliberations and withdraws from the discussions on which they have a particularly strong view and stands down for the period while the item is under discussion."

We wish to make the planning system fairer and more transparent. Accordingly, my Department continues to work with its partner bodies, such as the Local Government Association, to produce advice and guidance for elected members on propriety issues in planning. Indeed, the Planning Advisory Service, which is an arm of the Improvement and Development Agency, is financed by the Government. Its creation was one of the benefits of the £600 million in planning delivery grant allocation made available to improve the system.

When they were initially issued in 2002, the model codes were generally welcomed. There were certainly some complaints from the smaller parish and town councils, particularly about the requirements to register interests. It was feared that a sledgehammer was being used to crack a nut. However, many of the concerns have been eased as councillors have grown familiar with the conduct regime, and it now has broad support. This has been assisted by the Standards Board's own provision of support, guidance and training to parishes on the operation of the system.

It is sometimes suggested that the introduction of the code of conduct for parishes has caused parish councillors to resign. I took those fears very seriously, because it is obviously important to get the balance right. However, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that there is little or no evidence to suggest that significant numbers of councillors have resigned as a result of the code.

That brings me to the subject of the hon. Gentleman's debate. The recent reports of the Graham Committee and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Select Committee—which was so ably chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Chris Mole)—considered the future of the local government ethical regime. They supported the continuing inclusion of parish councillors within that regime.

The conduct regime has now been in operation for four years. We have recently reviewed it, and our proposals for change were set out in our discussion paper of 15 December 2005. They included proposals to make decision making under the regime more locally based, to make the Standards Board a more strategic regulatory body, and to make the code of conduct simpler, clearer and more proportionate. We are hoping to make changes to ensure that the framework meets the objectives that it was created to achieve, and that the lessons deriving from practical experience in operating the rules are learned.

As part of our follow-up to the discussion paper, our review of the code of conduct will take into account the recommendations on changes to the code made by the Standards Board. These include proposals for a reduction in the number of interests that members need to declare, and for a relaxation of the rules relating to prejudicial interests to support the advocacy role played by members, particularly in respect of dual-hatted members—that is, those who are members of more than one public body.

However, there is a continuing need to ensure that measures are in place to provide confidence that decisions are being made in the public interest, and that clear conflicts of interest—for example, where members stand to gain personally from a decision over and above the gain to others in the community—will continue to be proscribed by the code of conduct.

We believe that the vast majority of local councillors are honest and committed to the service of their communities. We wish to demonstrate to local communities that their councillors are signed up to the highest standards of conduct.

Mr. Lansley: It is now some six months since the Minister's colleague replied to a similar debate, and five months since the Government published their discussion paper. When are Ministers going to turn what appear—in principle, at least—to be the good recommendations of the Committee on Standards in Public Life and the Standards Board into practical changes, by means of a statutory instrument on the model codes of conduct?

Mr. Woolas: That is the crux of the matter. I am as keen as the hon. Gentleman is to get on with this. Local authorities are looking to us to make announcements on this issue. I am also conscious that there are other cases—which I am extremely grateful that he has not mentioned tonight—that have thrown up some lessons to be learned about the way in which we deal with these matters. I cannot give him a specific timetable, but I will, as soon as I am in a position to do so.

We need to provide assurance that standards are being maintained. That is why the ethical regime is vital, and why it is important that all tiers of local government, including parishes, should follow the codes of conduct. We should also learn the lessons of the past four years and do the best we can to ensure that there is consensus across the three tiers of local government in regard to the changes that we are seeking to introduce.

Question put and agreed to.

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Cancer Treatment

1. Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): If she will make a statement on waiting times for cancer treatment. [70832]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): May I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health cannot be here this afternoon because of a family illness? She was able to speak to the Opposition spokesmen personally yesterday to explain her absence and I am grateful to them for their understanding.

Cancer patients are now being diagnosed and treated more quickly than ever before, with almost 97 per cent. of them receiving their first treatment within a month of diagnosis.

Mrs. Hodgson: I welcome the fantastic progress in reducing cancer waiting times through the dedication and commitment of health service professionals and the extra investment in the NHS. However, is the Minister aware that cancer waiting times after first treatment remain a problem for all cancers, including prostate and bowel cancer, that the waiting times for endoscopy and colonoscopy have been a problem in the past and that, if the bowel cancer screening programme is to be successful, it is important that sufficient resources are put in place?

Ms Winterton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her remarks about the dedication and commitment of the staff who do such work and about extra investment, with which I absolutely agree. The problems that are due to follow-up treatments often involve radiotherapy. We have done a lot to improve radiotherapy provision. Of course, if it is a first treatment, it counts in the waiting times anyway, but there are unacceptably long waits for the second stage of treatment in certain parts of the country, so we have been increasing the number of radiotherapy staff, both in post and in training. We have been making better use of existing staff and new investment in radiotherapy treatment facilities. For example, the number of linear accelerators has increased by about 50 per cent. There is some way to go, but I can assure my hon. Friend that we take this very seriously. We are doing what we can to improve the situation, but that is against a background of increased improvements over a number of years.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Minister will be aware of the direct threat to the upper gastro-intestinal cancer unit at Frimley Park hospital in my constituency, not least because I have written to her Department three times to request a meeting on behalf of Surrey, Berkshire and Hampshire MPs, and three times I have been told no. In the last letter that I received from the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), I was told that a review of that decision would not be pre-empted, but I discovered the day after the letter was sent that interviews were taking place and decisions being made that explicitly pre-empted that review. Why cannot we have a meeting to ensure that that vital service, which contributes so much to health in the south-east, does not face imminent dismantling?

Ms Winterton: We must be absolutely clear about the process that takes place when we consider changing some of the cancer facilities. This is a classic example where cancer networks must look at some of the improving outcomes guidance, which shows that putting some of the cancers together in specialist centres actually saves lives. There is very clear evidence for that, and in a sense to ask for political interference would be wrong in a process that should be looked at very closely by those involved in the networks, which include clinicians, patient groups and representatives of the NHS. It is important that the review proposals are looked at very closely by the networks involved, and that process takes place for very good clinical reasons.

Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): I, too, welcome the decrease in waiting times for cancer care, but may I ask my hon. Friend for her assurance that cancers with lower profiles, such as myeloma, are not forgotten when we allocate resources?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to say that it is important that some of the high-profile cancers are not given more attention than some of the less well known ones. That is why we constantly review things. That can be done through the clinical cancer networks and through the guidance that is issued by the Department in conjunction with the profession to make sure that the very best care is available for patients who suffer in some of those circumstances.

National Programme for Information Technology

2. Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): If she will make a statement on the national programme for information technology. [70833]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): The national programme is an essential part of creating a safer and more modern and efficient national health service. It is delivering integrated IT systems that are critical to the effective functioning of the national health service in ever-increasing numbers right across the country—not least in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Tim Farron: The Secretary of State has told us that the connecting for health computer project will now cost £6.2 billion, but the chief operating officer of the project predicts costs in excess of £15 billion. Meanwhile, Westmoreland general hospital's coronary care unit in my constituency faces an uncertain future because of deficits that pale in comparison to those overspends. Will the Minister commit today to a full, independent, technical and financial audit of the project to ensure that public money is spent on the public's priorities?

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that this is indeed a major investment in the national health service. However, in contrast to NHS projects of the past, payment will be made only when the project is delivered. When the project is delivered, it will go further in improving patient care in the NHS. It will deliver more benefits to patients. I have looked at the hon. Gentleman's websites, where I read:

"Local MP Tim Farron is leading national calls for an independent review".

If he is to be the self-appointed leader of the national debate on this important issue, may I appeal for less simplistic analysis and more attention to detail? The project will improve patient care and it will not help to make exaggerated and nonsensical claims about it.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Part of that information technology has been NHS Direct. Chorley was the pioneer of NHS Direct, but we found out today that the Chorley centre is about to close, along with Bolton and Preston. Who is in charge of the Department—the Ministers or the chief executive? There is something wrong when people in Preston and Bolton who are being made redundant may be allowed to go to a new site, yet the people of Chorley have not been given the same assurance. Why not?

Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."

Andy Burnham: I hope that Conservative Members are cheering the success of NHS Direct, which is dealing with a huge volume of calls this year—6.8 million. However, I recognise the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised and I understand why he is expressing them, given the news that has been put out today. NHS Direct has to take decisions to make sure that it can offer a sustainable service, given that it is handling an increasing volume of calls and dealing with in excess of 9 million internet inquiries every year. My message to him is that there will be provision in the north-west. There is a possibility that a new service—a new NHS centre—will be located in the region of his constituency. I am happy to meet him and other colleagues who are affected by the changes to discuss those issues.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): I am surprised that the Minister did not mention the launch yesterday of another NHS information service at the Royal London Homeopathic hospital—the Complementary and Alternative Medicine Specialist Library. I have no doubt that he will have been fully briefed about that. That new service, which is extremely important and is backed by the Government, has one problem: many of the therapies provided by that one-stop shop are not yet available on the NHS. What is he going to do about that and what is he going to do about the alternative therapies that are available on the health service, such as homeopathy, which Nye Bevan used, but which is not widely understood or known about in parts of the country?

Andy Burnham: I am well aware of the hon. Gentleman's long-standing interest in these matters. Without a shadow of a doubt, he must have a glass raised to him at the Holland and Barrett annual shareholders meeting each year. I am not trivialising his interest and he raises an important matter, so I will examine it in respect of the IT systems and the other issues that he raises and write to him.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that many Labour Members believe that the national programme will be transformatory for the health service, especially due to electronic prescribing and care service records? Will he ensure that IT systems are compatible and, in that context, investigate the Luton and Dunstable hospital and the Royal Free hospital? Electronic records have to be taxied between those two hospitals because of the mismatch of electronic data links. Will he ensure that there is compatibility so that we have a better patient service?

Andy Burnham: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point, and perhaps the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) would do well to listen to it. The programme is being procured at a national level exactly to ensure that we get value for money with the systems and so that the systems are compatible. A key benefit of the new system will be that a patient's record will be instantly available to a clinician wherever that patient presents in the NHS. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that that will be an enormous step forward that will end some of the paper chase that goes on in the NHS. It is a clear expression of why the system will deliver improvements to patient care and value for money.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his first Health questions.

The Minister got right to the point about the IT system when he said that it was about delivery. The NHS needs an electronic patient record, but can he explain why it is more than two years late? The NHS also needs electronic prescriptions. According to the Government's targets, some 600,000 prescriptions should be transferred electronically each day, but the figure is in fact only about 13,000. The opportunity to make electronic bookings should mean that there are some 250,000 such bookings a month, but in fact there are only 20,000 a week. Can the Minister explain why the delivery about which he talks has so far failed lamentably on the Government's own targets?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful for both the hon. Gentleman's welcome and his broad recognition that modernising the national health service in such a way is the right thing to do. Rather than claiming that there has been no delivery, I can tell him that more than 1 million prescription messages have been issued via the new system and that 325,000 hospital appointments have been booked electronically. A key aspect of the way in which the programme is working is that the NHS pays only when the service has been delivered. The NHS has thus learned from past IT procurement and is doing the right thing by paying only when benefit is released to the service. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will support that approach.

NHS Nurses

3. Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the salaries of NHS nurses. [70834]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Caroline Flint): Investment of £1 billion in pay reform, including for nurses' pay, has delivered a high earnings growth of 2.8 per cent. between October 2004 and October 2005. We have agreed a 2.5 per cent. pay uplift for 2006-07, which will again deliver strong earnings growth this year. This is a good deal for nurses. A newly qualified nurse will earn £19,166, which is a 55 per cent. rise since 1997. I believe that that compares favourably with a newly qualified primary school teacher earning £19,161.

Mr. Mudie: I am delighted that there has been a 55 per cent. increase since 1997 and that the salary is just more than £19,000. A specialist nurse gets £23,000, so will the Minister outline whether "Agenda for Change" will give newly qualified nurses the opportunity to go on to that higher salary band?

Caroline Flint: My hon. Friend raises an important point. "Agenda for Change" is about completely transforming the way in which the pay bands operate to ensure that there is equal pay for equal value and, importantly, to give nurses the opportunity to progress up the scale. A senior specialist nurse can earn up to £31,000 and the salary for a nurse consultant rises up to £60,000. Part of "Agenda for Change" is job evaluation so that the skills and knowledge of individuals are examined and people can acquire skills and knowledge in order to move up the pay band.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Macmillan nurses at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital earn £5,000 less although they are on the same pay grade as similar nurses in Wolverhampton, which is just 15 miles away. We are concerned that, within such small regional areas, there is such a large difference in pay, with a possibility of poaching. What can the Minister do to reassure me on that?

Caroline Flint: I think that the hon. Gentleman raised that point in the Opposition day debate last week. He should understand that, for the first time, there is a pay band that covers both nurses and non-medical staff. Key to that is the job evaluation. He should be asking at local level about the skills and knowledge that are required of Macmillan nurses in one trust as opposed to another. We do not have regional pay scales, but the purpose of "Agenda for Change" was to have that job evaluation. Key to his point is the need to see what is expected of Macmillan nurses in one area and whether that is different from another area, and to take up the issue locally. That is important in defining what pay nurses of different types get in the area.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): What we just heard was good news, but is it good news if people looking for jobs do not have access to the benefits of "Agenda for Change"? Has the Minister had any discussions with the unions or the employers about the possibility of setting up a national redeployment, training and relocation scheme? Hopefully, that would address the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and mean that no one who wants to stay in the NHS has to leave it.

Caroline Flint: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He is absolutely right. I am pleased to say that NHS Jobs, which acts as a billboard for vacancies in the health service—a couple of hundred jobs for nurses are on the board currently—will provide exactly what he says, which is a redeployment service for those who may find themselves without a job as changes take place in hospitals. I reassure him that, where trusts talk about job changes or losses, there might be some compulsory redundancies, but that would be a last resort and kept to a minimum. It will mostly be a case of freezing posts and making less use of agency and temporary staff. I am pleased to say that NHS Jobs will look at redeployment opportunities.

Mental Health Services

4. James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): What assessment she has made of the impact of financial deficits on budgets for mental health services for 2006-07; and if she will make a statement. [70835]

8. Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Which mental health trusts are making cuts as a consequence of NHS deficits. [70839]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Planned expenditure for mental health services in 2006-07 is still being negotiated as strategic health authorities finalise their local delivery plans. In 2005-06, 11 out of 84 mental health trusts reduced planned expenditure by £16 million overall, while the complete expenditure increased by £368 million.

James Brokenshire: I thank the Minister for her response. At the last Health questions, she assured me that mental health services were one of her Department's top three priorities, notwithstanding existing NHS deficits. If that is the case, why is mental health not included on the list of the six key national NHS priorities specified in the Department's operational framework, and setting out the key principles for financial management for health trusts for this current year? Does she appreciate that the effect of that is that spending on mental health services by health trusts is likely to be frozen or cut this year as a consequence?

Ms Winterton: We should be clear about the improvements that have taken place in spending on mental health services—an increase of something like £1.6 billion over the past five years. Also, if we consider what happened last year, again, 11 out of 84 trusts reduced planned expenditure. They were going to spend £384 million more than they spent the year before, but in fact they spent £368 million. That means that overall expenditure on mental health has increased. It is clear, through the targets that have been set and the local delivery plans, that the actions we have adopted contributed towards that increase in mental health spending. Mental health under the previous Administration was a Cinderella service, suffering from years of underinvestment, unlike the situation under this Government.

Mr. Benyon: Berkshire Healthcare Trust faces cuts of £10.2 million in mental health care provision. One area particularly affected by those cuts is early intervention services which, as the Minister knows, are a key Government target in the national strategic framework for mental health. Will she carry out an assessment of the human costs of such cuts?

Ms Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is right that early intervention teams are important, which is why we introduced them. One of the many changes made under the Government to the delivery of mental health care is the greatly increased emphasis on care in the community. In Berkshire, I believe that the spending figure is about £200,000 less than was going to be spent, so it is not quite the same as what he suggested. I will look into his point, but I understand that the figure is about 0.1 per cent., because the overall budget is £77 million. There have been improvements in his area, and I hope that he welcomes them. I accept the point that he made about early intervention, and I will look at what cuts are proposed for early intervention teams, as I would be concerned about them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Due to the actions of our Government since 1997, mental health care has recently ceased to be the Cinderella of the NHS, but it is still something of a poor relation. Can the Minister reassure the House that people and patients have not been put at risk by budget reductions, about which Louis Appleby, the national director for mental health, is unhappy?

Ms Winterton: Given the extra investment in mental health services, we are anxious that primary care trusts and strategic health authorities should maintain a high quality of care. As I have said, when we looked at planned and actual expenditure last year, the difference was £16 million, but that does not mean that overall expenditure did not increase on mental health services. It did, and it has done so consistently in the years since the national service framework was introduced, along with new teams, modernised ways of working and increased investment. That has made a genuine difference to people who use our mental health services, and we certainly want to maintain those improvements.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Last week, Shropshire County PCT announced the closure of Whitcliffe mental health ward in Ludlow community hospital, not because of patient care needs—the patients will be transferred to the only remaining Victorian asylum operating in this country—but entirely as a result of financial deficits. The mental health trust operated at surplus in 2005-06, and it is due to break even in 2006-07, but it has been forced to make cuts and close that ward purely because of the financial deficits that affect the rest of the NHS in Shropshire. Why?

Ms Winterton: It is difficult for me to comment. As the hon. Gentleman said, the trust will break even this year, so I am not certain why he said that that in-patient ward will be closed. In-patient wards are often closed because services are provided in the community, thus reducing the need for in-patient beds. That may be the case in his constituency, or some of the patients may be transferred elsewhere because that is more appropriate. However, he should accept that in some instances—I will, of course, look at the point that he made—those decisions are made for good reasons, as the fact that there are teams in the community may mean that there is less need for in-patient beds.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): On Friday, the Department of Health produced a press release headed, "End of the 'Prozac nation'—more counselling, more therapy". It trumpeted a "ground-breaking initiative", "a major new programme". What we get is a couple of pilot schemes, while in Oxfordshire, Cambridgeshire and other places around the country that we have heard about, front-line mental health services are being cut. Is that not another case of the Department of Health being out of touch with what is happening on the ground?

Ms Winterton: I am disappointed by the sneering attitude that the hon. Gentleman is taking towards an initiative that has been welcomed by all the mental health charities and by mental health service users, who know the importance of psychological therapies. They know that we need to build up the case for saying that psychological therapies can be a very good alternative to drug therapies. We have always been clear in every White Paper and in our manifesto commitments that we would start a gradual programme of introducing psychological therapies. We need to show—which is why we have set up demonstration sites—the benefits of the approach not just to the individual, but to the local community. The programme is a good way of doing that, and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman's attitude goes against everything in which we have been supported by service users and mental health charities.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I presume the Minister was disappointed with Rethink when it published a damning catalogue of budget cuts to mental health services around the country: the closure of mental health day hospitals in Suffolk; mental health wards closed at St. George's, Tooting or forced to become mixed sex wards; and 5 per cent. cuts in Hertfordshire mental health services. Was she disappointed with the Mind report yesterday, which highlighted the absence of appropriate services for the one in six women who suffer mental health problems around childbirth, with 25 per cent. of them waiting more than six months for any support? Will she be disappointed tomorrow, when Pulse magazine brings to Parliament general practitioners who are alarmed at its survey showing 93 per cent. of GPs prescribing antidepressants contrary to National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidelines, because of a lack of available alternatives? Does she really think that our mental health services are having their best year ever?

Ms Winterton: Following the Rethink survey, we carried out a survey of all 84 NHS trusts whose full details we will publish tomorrow. I have been finalising everything that I want included in it. The figures show that, as I said, planned expenditure increased, but not by as much—by about £16 million less than was intended, out of a total expenditure by those trusts of £893 million. On psychological therapies and the Mind survey, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that, for post-natal depression, we need to increase the services available. That is why we have set up the demonstration sites that we announced last Friday. We know that much more can be done—for example, through health visitors to assist with post-natal—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am reluctant to interrupt the Minister, but we have an Order Paper which we must get through.

NHS Funding (East Anglia)

5. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When she next expects to meet representatives of primary care trusts and hospital trusts from East Anglia to discuss funding issues. [70836]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): Primary care trusts determine how best to use the funds allocated to them to plan, develop and improve health services for their local populations. No meetings are arranged with representatives from NHS trusts in East Anglia at present, but as Minister with responsibility for the eastern region, I expect to have meetings with representatives and to visit the region in the course of my work.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that the Queen Elizabeth hospital in King's Lynn is facing a £10 million deficit? The staff have my admiration for working tirelessly trying to sort out the crisis. Is it fair on the local community that the hospital is being forced to pay a usage charge of 10 per cent. on its borrowings? Is it fair that the PCT financial uplift for the next two years has been cancelled because of PCT reconfiguration? Does the Minister agree—if he puts his hand on his heart, I am sure he will—that my constituents deserve better from the Government?

Andy Burnham: I am sure that an hon. Member of his long standing in the House and a member of his party would accept that the NHS must live within its means. The hon. Gentleman must accept that there is a combination of cost pressures on the system this year and that decisions must be taken locally. Before he rides off on his high horse and lectures the Government about NHS funding, no PCT in Norfolk will be more than 3.5 per cent. under target funding. The Norfolk PCTs have experienced a two-year increase of 22.5 per cent. against a national average of 19.5 per cent. He should look at the facts on the money going into his local health service before he dishes out criticism and says that it is all the Government's fault.

Mr. Blizzard: As my hon. Friend knows, one of the ways in which the NHS is using its money in East Anglia involves requiring the primary care trusts to allocate a certain amount of money to the private sector to provide services free at the point of delivery for patients, which will provide patients with greater capacity and greater choice. In order that that process should work successfully in my part of the region, will my hon. Friend agree to meet me and my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) to discuss the way forward in our part of the region?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his constructive comments and agree to meet him and my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth. I am aware that the number of people waiting for an in-patient appointment for more than six months is down to almost nil within his region, and the number of people waiting for an out-patient appointment for more than 13 weeks is also down to a very low level. Huge improvements have been made, but I am ready to listen to him about how we can improve things further.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Is the Minister aware that because of the underfunding of the PCTs in my constituency—we get 90 per cent. of average funding—he is closing one hospital, halving the number of beds in a second, closing beds in a third and has cut to ribbons the money available for mental health? Will he meet me and my PCTs, all of which believe that the situation is a result of underfunding rather than overspending? The health service is now in its worst state for 30 years.

Andy Burnham: I find it hard to take lessons from a member of the Cabinet which slashed NHS funding. As I said to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), Norfolk PCTs have experienced a 22.5 per cent. increase, and similar increases have occurred across the region. I am ready to listen to the right hon. Gentleman and hear about the pressure on the ground, where difficult decisions are being made in NHS trusts. However, he would be the first to say, "The NHS must live within its means and only spend what it has coming through the door." I am sure that he wants to support us in ensuring that his local NHS has a viable future.

SunSmart Campaign

6. Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the progress of the SunSmart campaign. [70837]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Caroline Flint): The SunSmart campaign, launched today, is the national skin cancer prevention campaign run on behalf of UK health Departments by Cancer Research UK. This year, it will focus on men, in whom the incidence of malignant melanoma has quadrupled in the past 30 years, and also on outdoor workers.

Mrs. James: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has read my early-day motion on unstaffed, coin-operated sun-tanning salons, which I tabled last week. She will be aware that under-16s should not use sunbeds and that children are gaining access to unstaffed centres. Will she consider using the SunSmart campaign to raise awareness among children about the dangers of sunbed use?

Caroline Flint: That is an important issue. More than 100 MPs have signed the early-day motion. I will do more than use the campaign to raise awareness—officials from across the Departments will meet other interested parties to discuss regulation in that area, and in particular coin-operated tanning booths and under-16s.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): As part of the campaign, will the Minister ensure that awareness-raising information is targeted at men under 24 and over 64, who are particularly susceptible to not seeking medical advice when symptoms appear?

Caroline Flint: Part of the SunSmart campaign involves making sure that information goes to doctors and others, who can share it with other health professionals in their surgeries and make sure that leaflets are available. I am pleased that the campaign is focusing on men, because I am sorry to say gentlemen that you are not always very good at coming forward to look after your own health—take advantage of the information and enjoy the sun, but keep it in proportion.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Would my hon. Friend agree that a little bit of sun is really good for you, because it helps to create vitamin D in the body, which prevents a lot of stomach cancer, bowel cancer, osteoporosis and so on? Does she accept the international information that is available, and does she think that Cancer Research may have gone a wee bit too far?

Caroline Flint: I recently met my hon. Friend and Mr. Oliver Gillie to discuss this issue, and we have had discussions with Cancer Research. I think that my hon. Friend will find that the information does not advise not going out into the sun, but being proportionate. I have asked the Scientific Advisory Committee on Nutrition to consider some of the issues relating to adequate levels of vitamin D and prevention of other serious illnesses. My hon. Friend raises an important point.

NHS Deficit

7. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What estimate she has made of the year-end gross NHS deficit for the 2005-06 financial year. [70838]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): As at month six, the NHS is forecasting a net deficit of around £620 million for the financial year 2005-06. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to publish provisional out-turn figures for 2005-06 in early June.

Mr. Amess: I, too, welcome the Minister to his post and remember him as a well-respected colleague on the Health Committee, but that is where the pleasantries end. As he will know, the Royal College of Midwives, for instance, will be particularly concerned about this announcement. Is he aware that the decision to merge the three strategic health authorities in the east of England has concerned Southend hospital, which is not running a deficit and has actually saved money? The health professionals there are very worried that they will now be asked to bail out other health authorities that are running a deficit. Will the Minister confirm that that will not happen?

Andy Burnham: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generous welcome. I remember our time on the Health Committee. He always had a pleasant word for me then, so I hope that that will continue in this job.

I entirely understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making on merging strategic health authorities. We made a commitment at the general election to take money out of NHS bureaucracy by slimming the number of NHS organisations and taking £250 million out of the system. I remind him that his party made a much deeper proposal of cuts up to £600 million. One of the systems that we are taking forward is to ensure that those who do run a good ship do not get penalised as they did in the past and that organisations that are helping to recover the position can rightly expect that money to come back into their local health area. That is true for my constituency, too, and for many more represented on the Labour Benches of the House.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): May I also welcome my hon. Friend to his new position on the Front Bench? Does he agree that it is vital not only to know what the out-turn deficit is for this particular year and how we are going to deal with that in this financial year and in years to come, but to understand why we have this overspending minority of trusts when we have a Government who have doubled expenditure on the NHS in the past seven years?

Andy Burnham: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments and for welcoming me to the Front Bench.

I entirely agree that once we have got through the immediate difficulties, the important thing is to understand how these problems arose and to ensure that there is the strongest possible financial control at trust level. Boards must be given the information that they need in order to make decisions to ensure that the trust lives within its means, balances its books and remains in a strong position. I take on board my right hon. Friend's comments—he is right to make them—but I think that he would join me in saying that despite the problems, there is no trade-off against NHS standards. Within the current difficulties, the NHS continues to improve and is producing record waiting times for patients.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Last week, it was reported in the British Medical Journal that adverse drug reactions are estimated to cost the NHS nearly £500 million a year. In view of the current NHS deficits, is it wise for the Department of Health to terminate the contract for supplying the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin to prescribers? I, too, welcome the new Minister. I do not think that he was on the Health Committee when we carried out our inquiry into the pharmaceutical industry. The Government response to that recognised the importance of the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin as one of the very few sources of independent advice to prescribers. Will he therefore reconsider that decision?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome, and that another of my comrades from the Health Committee is giving me the benefit of his advice at my first Health questions. I always have the highest regard for what he says, and I have listened carefully to the point that he has made. These issues have to be considered in the round against the background of NHS deficits, and there are continual pressures on the national health service. However, I have listened to the hon. Gentleman today, and I will continue to listen carefully to his views.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I call the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Illsley: My anonymity knows no bounds—[Laughter.] I have almost forgotten what I was going to say.

My hon. Friend the Minister referred a moment ago to primary care trusts and health authorities running a good ship. That has been exactly the case in Barnsley, Doncaster and Rotherham in South Yorkshire. Sheffield, however, despite brokerage and borrowings of £20 million, is still £16 million in deficit. Consequently, every health authority in South Yorkshire is now being asked to pay a 2.5 per cent. levy. For Barnsley, that means £6 million being taken out of the PCT's budget before the financial year even begins. Does my hon. Friend think that it is fair that the people who have been running a good ship are being penalised for their success?

Andy Burnham: My hon. Friend makes an extremely fair point. His PCT is similar to mine in many respects, being in a former mining area. I agree that the money to which he has referred is vital in an area such as Barnsley, just as such funding is needed in my constituency to improve public health and preventive care, so I understand entirely what he is saying. This is about putting in place a fair regime in the NHS, so that those organisations that bail—[Hon. Members: "Bail?"] Those organisations that help those that are having problems should not suffer the consequence of not seeing the money come back into the system. My hon. Friend is right to raise that point. It is not right that organisations that manage their affairs well should compensate those that do not. The incentives in the system must reward those who run a good organisation.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Although we recognise that there has been a huge increase in funding to the national health service, which we welcome, does the Minister recognise that a depressingly familiar pattern is reasserting itself? This afternoon, we have seen the Minister with responsibility for mental health services standing at the Dispatch Box telling the House how important those priority services are, yet PCTs all round the country are cutting the growth budgets available for those services, regarding them as a soft touch for available resources. This is a familiar pattern. What steps is the Department taking to ensure that that is not allowed to continue?

Andy Burnham: It would be deeply irresponsible, when financial pressures have arisen, not to take steps to get the local health economy back into balance. However, I understand the serious point that the right hon. Gentleman is making about the position of mental health in the overall health economy, and about ensuring that it is not the specialty in which cuts are made and from which funds are taken first. I respect that point. Overall, however, it is up to the local health economies to make a proper judgment on their priorities for mental health services. But, as the right hon. Gentleman says, mental health services are not optional, and it is vital that they are adequately resourced.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that deficits do not necessarily reflect the excellent standard of health care in hospitals such as those at Southport and Ormskirk in my constituency? They are to be congratulated on being placed among the top 40 hospitals in the country, on having attained level 3 in the clinical negligence scheme for trusts, and on having the lowest MRSA rates in the country. My constituents should not be penalised for any errors made in strategic health authorities or in the health economy generally. The people should not pay; the executives should sort themselves out.

Andy Burnham: My hon. Friend's analysis is absolutely right. Many PCTs in the areas with the highest health needs and the greatest health inequalities have managed to break even and, in some cases, return a surplus. It would be wrong if those PCTs were unable to reap the rewards of that good financial management. The system that we are establishing will ensure that those organisations receive their funds back if they have helped, in-year, to recover the financial position of another health body.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I know that the Minister is new to his post but he had better take care, because this time last year the Secretary of State was 80 per cent. out on the net deficit that the NHS was experiencing. Before he starts quoting a figure of £620 million, he ought to come to the House and tell us the actual unaudited figures at the year-end, rather than speculating on the basis of six-monthly figures. The consequences of that, and of paying off such deficits, are apparent across the country. Job losses were announced at Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust on Friday, at Nottingham University Hospitals NHS Trust yesterday, and at NHS Direct today, affecting directly the constituents of the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and my constituents. The people affected, including nurses who face the prospect of redundancy, deserve better.

The Minister talks about financial control, but will he tell us what is the Government's plan for financial control this year? Is it what the operating framework said in January—that every organisation must plan to recover their deficits from 2005-06 and balance their books this year? Or is it, as the Secretary of State told me in April, that every organisation with an overspend must improve this year, and that by the end of the financial year, monthly expenditure should be covered by monthly income? Those are two completely different financial regimes. Which is it?

Andy Burnham: As I said in my response to the main question, provisional out-turn figures for the year-end will be published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in early June, so the hon. Gentleman does not have long to wait. While I accept that difficult decisions are being made on the ground in his constituency and others, the purpose of those is to get the NHS into a stable position so that it is living within its means. There are not widespread redundancies across the piece—as I have mentioned, many parliamentary colleagues have a surplus in their health economy. The problem is focused on the 7 per cent. of NHS organisations that are bearing the vast majority of the deficit. On the hon. Gentleman's question about financial control, he knows that we are putting turnaround teams into those trusts specifically to help those organisations bring themselves back to financial balance by the end of this year. The answer could not be clearer: we are taking the difficult decisions necessary to get trusts back into balance.

General Practitioners

9. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): How many general practitioners there were in the NHS in (a) 1997 and (b) 2005; and if she will make a statement. [70840]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): In 1997, 28,046 GPs were working in the national health service. In 2004, that figure increased by 4,692, to 32,738, which is an increase of 17 per cent. Those figures do not include retainers and registrars who represent a potential pool of about 3,000 GPs.

Joan Ruddock: I welcome my hon. Friend to his new position. That national picture is reflected in Lewisham, where we have but four vacancies, compared with 20 in 2002, and recruitment is going well thanks to Government support. Will he ensure, however, that the Government monitor the retention of those GPs, giving extra support to PCTs should it prove necessary? Will he also ensure that patients benefit from increased GP numbers by getting better access to out-of-hours services?

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The news from Lewisham is good. She is right, however, that it is essential that we maintain the successes made in GP recruitment, especially in disadvantaged and inner-city areas. That is why we have focused and targeted resources on supporting PCTs in those areas, especially with regard to recruitment and retention. We know that it has not always been easy to attract GPs into some of our most disadvantaged communities. I also agree that it is essential to ensure that improvements in primary care facilitate enhanced access to primary care services in every community.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his new duties. The National Audit Office tells us that up to 1 million people in England can no longer rely on out-of-hours services from a GP that they took for granted in 1997, despite the figures quoted by the Minister and a 22 per cent. overspend on out-of-hours services. What is he doing about PCTs such as Harrow, Burntwood, Lichfield and Tamworth, Eastleigh and Test Valley South, North Bradford, New Forest, Richmond and Twickenham and Sutton and Merton, which the NAO says are unable to guarantee patients' access to a GP at night and at weekends?

Mr. Lewis: The transition to the new GP contracts, in terms of out-of-hours services, has on the whole been smooth. That was actually confirmed by the recent National Audit Office report. As for the areas where there are difficulties, we need to examine them with the relevant primary care trusts, and ensure that out-of-hours services are available to patients in those communities where that is appropriate. However, the suggestion that the new contracts have led overall to a deterioration in out-of-hours services is not backed up by the very report to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Health (Patient/Public Involvement)

10. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): If she will make a statement on the future of patient and public involvement in health. [70841]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): An expert panel was set up to consider the evidence collected in our recent review of patient and public involvement. We are currently considering its recommendations, and will make an announcement shortly.

Philip Davies: Does the Minister agree that it is crucial for the public to be involved in decisions relating to health care provision in communities? Does she accept that either abolishing or radically changing the forums only two years after their introduction will be yet another prime example of the Government's permanent revolution of our NHS, which generates a lot of huffing and puffing from Ministers but delivers very little to the public?

Ms Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is important to have good patient and public involvement in local decisions about health care, especially as some 80 per cent. of the budget is now devolved to local level. The reason we want to change the current system of patients forums is that many people in them felt that not enough resources were going to the front line. They felt that they would be able to do more if they had more control at local level, and if there was more accountability. For example, they wanted to work more closely with overview and scrutiny committees. We shall be presenting a great many ideas that I believe will lead to improvements in this important area.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I believe that public participation is key to ensuring that the NHS delivers the quality services that local people want. The advent of foundation trusts has provided more opportunities for the views of local people to be sought through those new structures, but what consideration has been given to strengthening public involvement in the direction and provision of primary care services at that very local level?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right: public participation is certainly one of the keys to ensuring that there is accountability at local level, and that local people are involved in decision making. That is one of the reasons why we wanted to consider the new structures. As there is a stronger role for primary care trusts in commissioning and as there are fewer PCTs, it is important to ensure that there are good local networks involving not only individuals but local organisations and local authorities in some of that local decision making.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I suggest that the Government's record on this issue is very poor. They replaced the system of community health councils with a system that is not working. Patients forums have cost £12 million more to run, and staff turnover is very high. The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health was introduced, only for the Government then to announce its abolition. The total cost of that was £100 million. Last year the Government scrapped their plans for reform, and now there is speculation that patients forums themselves will be abolished.

Given that confusion, will the Minister assure the House that the expertise built up by forum volunteers will not be lost in the latest round of Government changes, and will she do her best to get a grip on the shambles?

Ms Winterton: The difficulty that we experienced with the CHCs was that they offered services in different ways. Some would offer complaints services, for instance, while others would not. That is why we set up a whole new structure, including the patient advice and liaison service in local trusts, the Independent Complaints Advocacy Services to deal with complaints, and patients forums to consider patient and public involvement at local level.

We will be looking further into how to improve the current system, as people working in patient forums have identified some difficulties, particularly the problem of ensuring that resources are spent at local level. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that that is exactly why we set up the expert panel—to ensure that we improve in future by building on the expertise that already exists in the patient forums.

Mental Health Services

11. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What steps her Department is taking to increase access to child mental health services. [70842]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The Department's recovery and support unit is working closely with strategic health authorities to ensure that comprehensive child and adolescent mental health services, as defined in the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services, are available to all who need them.

Mr. Jack: In welcoming the Minister to his new post, may I remind him that early in 2004, the then Health Minister, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), told me that an 80-week waiting list for a child to access psychological services was unacceptable? The Cumbria and Lancashire strategic health authority confirmed in March that the waiting time was now 93 weeks, which many would regard as unbearable. I have been told that action has been taken to address that deficit, so will the Minister confirm that he will do everything possible to speed up all the necessary measures to reduce that totally unacceptable waiting period?

Mr. Lewis: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that was and is unacceptable and I congratulate him on highlighting those issues. Appropriate action has been taken to deal with the problem, as he has acknowledged. For example, in his locality a number of new posts and services have been created: a clinical child psychologist, a child and adolescent mental health services assistant psychologist, part-time administrative support, an attention deficit disorder nurse, a primary care liaison specialist post and a specialist health worker located in the youth offending team. All that investment should significantly improve the position. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will keep me informed of developments; we certainly expect to see significant progress in the months ahead.

Primary Care Trusts and Ambulance Trusts

3.32 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): With permission, Mr. Speaker, and in the unavoidable absence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I should like to make a statement on primary care trusts and NHS ambulance trusts. Detailed information for each area has, for the convenience of hon. Members, been placed on the Board since 1 pm.

In my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's written statement of 18 October 2005, she explained that strategic health authorities had been invited to submit proposals to the Department of Health on how to streamline SHAs and strengthen primary care trusts. Four clear criteria underpinned that exercise: the need to improve health and reduce inequalities; to strengthen the PCTs' commissioning function; to improve co-ordination with social services through greater coterminosity between PCT and local authority boundaries; and to deliver at least a 15 per cent. reduction in management and administrative costs.

In the intervening period, SHAs have consulted local people, staff and clinicians, partners in local government and a range of other local stakeholders on the proposals for SHAs, PCTs and ambulance trusts. Many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have offered their views and I am very grateful to them. After local consultations, SHAs submitted their reports and recommendations to the Department. An external panel, established to advise Ministers on the proposals, has since met to consider in detail each proposal for PCTs and SHAs. After receiving its advice, we announced on 12 April that the numbers of SHAs would reduce from 28 to 10.

Ministers have now considered the recommendations and the panel's advice on PCTs. I can now inform the House that the number of PCTs will fall from 303 to 152, and that the new organisations will be established on 1 October 2006. The population covered by each PCT will rise from an average of around 165,000 at present to an average of just below 330,000. About 70 per cent. of the new PCTs will be coterminous with the boundaries of local authorities with social services responsibilities, which compares with about 44 per cent. of PCTs that are currently coterminous with their local authorities.

In some areas, concerns have been expressed that larger PCTs could lose a locality focus and divert resources away from deprived areas or that smaller PCTs could lack commissioning power. We acknowledge those concerns and have sought to strike a careful balance between those conflicting demands. In response, we propose that four general conditions be applied: first, that all PCTs retain and build on partnership arrangements; secondly, that a strong locality focus must be retained and, where necessary, that local structures should be put in place; thirdly, that all PCTs must deliver their share of the 15 per cent. management cost saving, strengthen commissioning and ensure robust management of financial balance and risk; and fourthly, that the new PCTs and SHAs should consider how any further conditions relating to issues that arose during the consultation could be applied.

In some areas, the new proposals differ from those suggested by the SHA and the external panel. Having taken into account all the evidence and sought local consensus wherever possible, we have judged that in those circumstances, the alternatives could better satisfy the "Commissioning a Patient-led NHS" criteria and have the best possible chance of success.

On PCTs as providers of services, let me restate the Secretary of State's clear commitment to the House on 25 October 2005. She said that "district nurses, health visitors and other staff"

delivering clinical services

"will continue to be employed by the PCT unless and until it decides otherwise."—[Official Report, 25 October 2005; Vol. 438, c. 152.]

Our aim in making these changes is to benefit both patients and taxpayers. Fewer, more strategic PCTs will be better placed to ensure effective commissioning of services for patients, and to support the development of practice-based commissioning among GPs and other primary care staff. Patients will receive the right care and treatment in the right place, and at the right time. The taxpayer will see the release of £250 million worth of savings annually, through the merging of back-office functions and a reduction in administrative costs, for reinvestment in front-line services from 2008-09. That could pay, for example, for roughly 50,000 heart operations or major improvements in services for people with long-term conditions, especially older people. The changes will also build stronger partnerships between the NHS and local government.

The reconfiguration of PCTs is the first stage in strengthening the commissioning function. The next stage is a development programme for all PCTs, which will ensure that they are strong, confident organisations fit for driving forward the NHS reforms that we are implementing.

On ambulance trust reorganisation, in June 2005 the Government accepted the recommendations set out by Peter Bradley, our national ambulance adviser, in the review entitled "Taking Healthcare to the Patient: Transforming NHS Ambulance Services", which set out a vision for ambulance services. In future, they will provide more care in the home and more treatment at the scene, give better advice to patients over the telephone and ensure faster response times to save more lives. The review made it clear that in order to ensure that ambulance trusts have the right strategic capacity, infrastructure and staff to deliver these improvements in patient care, there should in future be fewer, larger ambulance trusts. These changes will enable standards within the new trusts to be levelled up to those of the best.

In her written statement of 14 December 2005, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out our intention to consult and to ensure that the benefits outlined in the ambulance review can be fully realised. Following this consultation, the Secretary of State has now decided that from 1 July 2006, most of the existing 29 NHS ambulance trusts will merge into 12, with separate management arrangements for the Isle of Wight. For now, Staffordshire ambulance service will remain a separate trust, working in partnership with the new West Midlands ambulance service, but will eventually merge at a later date.

Feedback from most areas was supportive of our proposals. However, we have decided to address the public's concern that local responsiveness and flexibility could be lost through having larger trusts by requiring ambulance trusts to ensure that their services are meeting the needs of all localities and populations within their boundaries. Those changes should mean more investment in front-line services as trusts identify savings in back-room functions; improved patient care through providing an opportunity to raise the standard of the service provided by all trusts to the level of the best; better emergency planning, with greater capacity and the capability to respond to major incidents of all kinds; more integrated services; and better career opportunities for staff.

Changes of this kind are inevitably difficult. We have not sought to impose a single blueprint on the NHS; instead, we have listened carefully to representations from all Members and from local communities and organisations. Wherever possible, we have responded positively to them. We have one aim above all: to deliver better health care to patients. I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I thank the Minister for providing me with a copy of his statement in advance, and for putting local information on the Board for the use of hon. Members.

Since Labour came to office, there have been seven reorganisations of the NHS already, and today's pair are the eighth and ninth. Under the cloak of words such as "modernisation" or "reform", this is change for change's sake. Has the Minister any idea of the effect that the reorganisation has on staff morale, and on the ability to retain the good? It means that underperformers inevitably will be recycled into similar jobs in the new organisations. It causes instability among clinical staff—doctors, nurses and allied professions—and inflicts uncertainty and inefficiency in the NHS supply chain. Above all, is he aware that it leaves patients wondering where they feature in it all?

The Government have form, however. They never allow anything to settle and bed down—much to the consternation of the hard-working people trying to deliver the front-line patient services. In Government, as in all walks of life, the addiction to constant structural change is a well known technique deployed by those who did not get it right the first time—or the second, third, fourth, fifth or sixth times. Imposing another restructuring and a further reorganisation is a great wheeze to put through changes in a bid to avoid accountability and to keep running ahead of mistakes.

The mounting job losses in the NHS show that the Government are no longer lulling the public, whose trust in the Government, not least in respect of the NHS, has plummeted. Let us look at why the Government have felt impelled to announce yet more changes to the NHS—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): It says here.

Mr. O'Brien: Indeed, it does say it here, because that is what I wrote.

First, let us look at ambulance trusts. Peter Bradley's review concluded that there should be fewer of them, but that they should be larger, yet no evidence for that major change was contained in the report, or made available since. Ministers then decided to reduce the number of strategic health authorities to align with their obsession with regions, notwithstanding the electorate's rejection of the idea in the north-east. With sleight of hand, Ministers have used the reorganisation as an excuse to reduce the number of trusts to 12, and then they have ducked the flak by suggesting that that was Peter Bradley's idea and recommendation all along. Will the Minister therefore undertake to place in the Library of the House any evidence that relates specifically to claims that creating large trusts will lead to improvements in patient care?

How does the reorganisation achieve closer integration of all the emergency services? Will the Minister explain how a north-west regional ambulance service will integrate better with the newly merged Merseyside and Cheshire police force—a merger that will be carried out in the teeth of maximum hostility and objection? How will it integrate better with contingency planning in Cheshire, or with the Cheshire fire service's move to sub-regional control rooms?

Will the Minister comment on proposals to reduce control room numbers by co-aligning them with the police and fire services? The House should bear it in mind that in Warwickshire, for example, the fire service responds to some 3,000 emergency calls a year, whereas the ambulance services respond to some 100,000.

Who is co-ordinating the reorganisation across Government? Co-ordinated is the last thing that it is—perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister has been devoting his time to this matter recently. It is shambolic, inconsistent centralising by an arrogant Government who claim to listen but who choose not to hear the views of those who work on the front line and who know best.

The official consultation on ambulance trusts lasted from the middle of September last year to near the end of March this year, yet the NHS appointments commission sent out letters on 30 January—in the middle of the consultation period—asking for nominations for men and women to chair the new NHS ambulance trusts. The question arises—was not the decision therefore a foregone conclusion?

I have had a letter from Roger Moore, the chief executive of the appointments commission, in which he stated that the recruitment began "at the request of the Department of Health".

I am pleased that concerted work by MPs across Staffordshire and by the shadow health team, supported by huge amounts of work by the people of the county, has caused Ministers to backtrack on axing Staffordshire ambulance service for up to two years. That 24-month period was set out in the handout on the Board in the Members' Lobby, but not in the statement. That is a classic fudge, as it puts Staffordshire ambulance trust in the departure lounge. However, will the Minister give the House an assurance that unless the west midlands service is brought up to the standard of Staffordshire there will be no hint of a merger, whether in two years or beyond?

Given today's statement, any right-thinking person is entitled to regard the Government's consultation as a sham. Constant change will undermine what has already been achieved; for example, by turning round the East Anglian ambulance trust. The Buckinghamshire and Northamptonshire service is about to complete the process of splitting; now they will have to go through the upheaval of being merged again.

We are not against the restructuring of PCTs per se—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] The Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bury, South Mr. Lewis suggests that the whole statement was about PCTs; clearly he was not listening, as much of it dealt with ambulance trusts. On PCTs, as distinct from ambulance trusts, we are not opposed to restructuring, but we have always said that future functions need to be defined before such restructuring takes place.

In 2002, the Department of Health abolished the 11 regional offices of the former NHS executive and about 100 health authorities. Today, the Government are bringing back that map. Has the Minister estimated the cost of that U-turn, which takes us back to the position four years ago? He may talk of the Secretary of State's clear commitment in October 2005 about the functions of PCTs, yet three months before that the DOH was equally clear, in "Commissioning a patient-led NHS", when it called for PCTs to become by 2008. The Secretary of State backtracked on that commitment, without reassessing whether the proposed structures would be fit for purpose. Now, no one is clear.

"patient-led and commissioning-led organisations with their role in provision reduced to a minimum"

As the Health Committee said in January, when it attacked the Government's indecision,

"we are appalled at the continuing lack of clarity about whether or not PCTs will eventually divest themselves of provider functions."

The Department of Health's NHS operating framework for 2006-07, published on 26 January, offered little further clarity, stating:

"Where PCTs do continue to provide services, they will need to put in place clear governance procedures that ensure that there is no undue influence from the provider side on commissioning decisions."

Will the Minister detail how 15 per cent. management cost savings can be made when the Government are calling for each PCT to have two sets of managers—one for commissioning and one for direct services?

The problem for the Minister is that all this restructuring has gone on without putting in place the necessary precondition for its having a realistic chance of success: defining the future functions of PCTs. Will the Minister tell us how many PCTs are predicted to be direct providers of services in two years' time? New organisations can hardly be expected to deliver unless and until they have clarity of purpose.

In his statement the Minister said that in some cases the new proposals differ from those suggested by the strategic health authorities and the external panel. Will he tell the House how many PCTs the expert panel proposed should be created overall; and will he publish in full the panel's advice so that we can see to what extent the Government arrived at different decisions and the implications of the variations?

The Government seem only now to be waking up to the cost of the reconfiguration and the redundancies that go with it. Can the Minister confirm that the estimated cost of this latest round of NHS reconfiguration, which will merely take us back to where we were four years ago, will be £320 million? Will he also confirm that at £250 million—the figure he gave in his statement—the savings will be less than the cost? Is he confident even of that amount, or was the Health Committee right when it said that savings of between £60 million and £135 million were nearer the mark? Are those estimates gross or net, given the cost of the redundancies that will be inevitable to deliver on that Government promise?

What is the time scale? The House is entitled to have that crucial information in a year when the Government's financial control of, and credibility with, the NHS is shot to pieces and the NHS is in confusion and plunged into at least 10 months of uncertainty and chaos at PCT level. This is no way to run an NHS.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Opposition spokesman took longer than the Minister. I do not want to see that practice continued.

Andy Burnham: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and in that long speech, I will seek to pick out the points of substance that there were.

There is no confusion. Our aim overall is to improve patient care. That is what we are in business to do, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman without fear of contradiction that patient care is improving. Patients are not waiting for more than six months for in-patient treatment. On the whole, they wait a maximum of 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment. There is clear evidence of progress. That is what guides our changes; it is what guides these changes, so I can assure him that there is no confusion on our part at least.

The hon. Gentleman says that this is change for change's sake. I point out to him that the NHS changes; it is different from what it was in 2000. We have an ambitious programme of reform to drive through in the NHS. We want to ensure that people can choose where they are treated and that the wait for that treatment is short, once the full reform programme is introduced. That will require strong commissioning throughout the NHS. It will require people cleverly commissioning services and using their organisational strength. That is why we are making these changes. He will know that some changes have begun, and some of the changes that we have formalised today have already begun to take shape.

On ambulance trusts, the hon. Gentleman claims that we have an obsession with the regions—far from it. He asks what the connection is with other emergency services. Surely, it makes sense to ensure that, at regional level, there is the contingency capacity to deal with major events and that capacity is planned regionally. I hope that he agrees that there is some logic in doing that. He claims that there is no support, but

Peter Bradley's proposals commanded strong support from within the ambulance service, particularly because they clearly focused on the professional development of those who work in the service, thus giving them the ability to shape ambulance services in future.

The hon. Gentleman claims that we have not listened. Clearly, if he looks at the proposals for PCTs that we are publishing today, he will see that precisely the opposite is the case. We have indeed listened to hon. Members—not just Labour Members, but Opposition Members, too—and we have taken on board those concerns. He asks where the proposals differ and whether we will put the evidence in the Library. I would be happy to do that, but the reason why we have taken those decisions and listened to those representations from hon. Members on both sides of the House is that we want a consensus of support for the new organisation, because it is our judgment that the organisation will have the best chance of success if it is underpinned by strong community support. That is exactly why we have done that.

The hon. Gentleman asks me whether we will detail where the cost savings can be made. There will be one-off costs in relation to the exercise, but the savings will come year on year. As for the timetable, we expect that the savings from the exercise—some £250 million a year—will be realised by 2008. That, of course, will be a recurrent saving for front-line services.

There is a logic and coherence to our proposals, and the hon. Gentleman talks of incoherence and confusion among Government Members. I put it to him that the Conservative party's policy at the last general election was to take about £650 million from so-called NHS bureaucracy, as defined by the James review; coupled with that was the patient's passport, which would have taken money from the health service. What kind of organisational chaos would the combination of those policies have created?

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I thank the Minister for advance sight of his statement.

The Government abolished health authorities four years ago and created primary care groups and primary care trusts, and they are now merging them back together to create health authorities. Were the Government right to abolish health authorities, and are they right to recreate them? Is that what the Minister is telling the House? Or did they make a mistake four years ago, and will he admit that to the House?

Can the Minister provide evidence of where the £250 million cost saving will come from, given that the Select Committee on Health was very sceptical that savings on that scale could be achieved? He did not answer the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman's question about the number of redundancies that are implied by a £250 million annual saving. How many people will lose their jobs?

On responding to local consultation, I thank the Minister for listening to some very effective lobbying from the west of England, which has resulted in keeping PCTs coterminous with social service authorities. I welcome that fact, because I was sceptical that the Government would listen on that point. I assume that he already knows that I was pressing for that. I also welcome the fact that, following recent political trends, the south-west of England has turned from blue to orange.

On coterminosity, the Minister said in his statement that about 70 per cent. of PCTs will be coterminous. Is there a limit to that, or will he go further? What is the restriction on having 100 per cent. coterminosity and having real integration of health and social services? How far will the Government go?

What are the promises of PCTs that have been abolished worth? Many of my colleagues are worried that, although they have been promised things by existing PCTs about new community services, the successor bodies may well say that they are not bound by the promises of the predecessor bodies. Can the Minister give us an assurance that, when an existing PCT has made a promise, the successor bodies will honour that promise?

Finally, on the ambulance trust mergers, what confidence can people living in rural areas have that the very large ambulance trusts will not inevitably concentrate on urban centres? Whereas small trusts could respond to local circumstances, larger ones may neglect rural areas to hit their performance targets.

Andy Burnham: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his constructive response. In the course of his remarks, he made the point that we have listened. The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) would have done well to take that point on board. We are not recreating health authorities; the building blocks are the same. The exercise has shown a range of interest in and commitment to primary care trusts around the country. People seem to be attached to them. The changes are not happening everywhere. In my area, in Greater Manchester, the building blocks will largely remain the same—as they will in London. Experience has shown that there is a PCT size that is more effective in commissioning good quality patient care. We are making the changes in that respect and ensuring that the NHS is able to use its strength at local level to drive up quality for patients.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) mentioned coterminosity. I am in full agreement with him on that point. I have long believed that there needs to be much closer working between the national health service and social services at a local level. I fully support such moves, including even pooled budgets—that kind of approach. I hope that the proposals will pave the way for much greater joint working. There are examples around the country where that working is close. The greater level of coterminosity allows those partnerships to be built. The level is around the mid-70 per cent. mark. We have to strike a balance between representations from local Members and not creating bodies that are too big to do the job. We have sought to manage those tensions. We have produced a significant increase in the number of PCTs that are coterminous with their social services departments. That will be a positive step forward for patients and particularly for older people in those regions.

There will, of course, be redundancies as a result of the exercise, but we made it clear at the election that we would be clear about reducing unnecessary NHS bureaucracy. There should be savings made in merging back-room functions, where that can be done, but at the same time we do not want to diminish the power of PCTs to be effective commissioners for their communities. Today's proposals strike that balance.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for his statement, which will be widely welcomed. It is good news in my constituency of Darlington, in particular. I also thank Ministers for listening to the views of the many local people who campaigned in large numbers to retain Darlington's primary care trust. Does he agree that his statement is a sure sign that, in the future, we will need to strengthen still further the working arrangements between not just health and social services, but housing services, so that more people—particularly old people—get access to the locally delivered, locally commissioned seamless services that they surely deserve?

Andy Burnham: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments. He has done more than anybody in the House to bring about the improving NHS that we have. The PCT structure on the ground is largely due to the changes that he made as Secretary of State for Health. I am grateful for his comments about listening. We have indeed listened. I know that strong representations were made by him and others in the north-east region. As I said to the hon. Member for Eddisbury a moment ago, it was right that we listened to those representations because we want the organisations to command solid local support. I am pleased that we have achieved some success in my right hon. Friend's area.

My right hon. Friend made a point about housing. When we consider coterminosity, we all think about social services, but he is absolutely right to say that we can think more widely about links with councils and consider the provision of adequate housing and leisure and cultural services to local populations so that we can really begin to understand how to make people more active. All those possibilities are opened up by greater coterminosity and I am grateful for the welcome given by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): When we in Hertfordshire were faced with the prospect of one PCT, we campaigned for two, so we are delighted that we have got two. The east and north Hertfordshire PCT will serve my constituency. What safeguards will be in place to ensure that that new PCT serves the less-well-off parts of my constituency, such as Waltham Cross and Cheshunt, and does not focus too much of its time on—how can I put this delicately?—the posh parts in the north of Hertfordshire?

Andy Burnham: That is proof that we listened to the hon. Gentleman's representations. It is obviously for the champion of the underprivileged on the Conservative Benches to ensure that his local PCT pays adequate regard to the parts of his constituency in which the health needs are greatest, although, of course, that is something that local responsiveness should pick up.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend for his statement. He will be aware that the strategic health authority recommended that the new merged primary care trust that will serve my community and Rochdale be called Rochdale PCT. I welcome the Minister's decision to call it Heywood, Middleton and Rochdale PCT because I think that that is the right order for the name, which is important to my local community. Will he ensure that membership of the new board is representative of the two constituencies and two primary care trusts and, especially, that the resources are evenly spread across both areas?

Andy Burnham: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. I am pleased that my primary care trust will still be called the Ashton, Leigh and Wigan PCT because I would be in great trouble indeed if it was called something else. I understand that such local connections and ties are extremely important and am pleased that Heywood has been recognised in the name of my hon. Friend's PCT. As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker), it is crucial that the new organisations serve all parts of the areas that they cover and, especially, that they pick out the health needs in those areas and bear down on the health inequalities that are important to him, me and Greater Manchester in particular.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I warmly thank the Minister, his predecessor and the Department of Health for listening to the overwhelming view of the people of Cheshire and establishing not one but two PCTs to ensure that the different cultures of east and west Cheshire are properly reflected in the provision.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Posh.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): And Becks.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to my hon. Friends and am sure that the Minister got the gist of what I was saying.

It is important that the interests of both sides of Cheshire are properly catered for in the provision of health services. Does the Minister accept that there is concern that the target arrival times are not being met by the existing ambulance service? Will he give an assurance that those target times will be met under the merged ambulance service in the north-west?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's warm welcome for the proposal. I hope that we will not see the emergence of an east-west Cheshire split and an explanation of the different cultures between the two. I am grateful for his recognition that we have listened and created a structure with which he is comfortable. Under the new North West ambulance service, which will serve my constituency, too, it will obviously be crucial that performance is improved across the piece. When improvements need to be made to services, it is important that the body takes particular care to bear down on the problems and ensures that all residents of the north-west can look forward to and enjoy the same standards of service. I am sure that the new service will be focused on those matters.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): I welcome the statement and am pleased that the Government have taken notice of local consultation. What we have in front of us is not the top-down method that the exercise was accused of pursuing late last year.

In relation to moving PCTs to be coterminous with local authority social services, what plans does the Minister have to ensure that there will be joint working where the changes took place in this round? It is not always easy to achieve that between local authorities and local health communities, as many of us have experienced. What plans does he have across government to ensure that local social services, health and, probably, housing work well together from day one, as opposed to waiting for that to evolve at a local level over the years?

Andy Burnham: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments and am grateful to him for making an important point. I think hon. Members on both sides of the House realise that the NHS has perhaps not run the best consultation exercises and has not been as good at listening to local communities as it should be for the fine organisation that it is. The exercise, for all its difficulties—I recognise that there have been difficulties along the way—has produced a good outcome. The NHS has shown that it can listen to local opinion and come up with structures that respond to concerns expressed on the ground.

My right hon. Friend is right. There is a lot of talk about the need to have joint working between health and social services, but often that talk runs ahead of the reality. His predecessor as Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, David Hinchliffe, the former hon. Member for Wakefield, was passionate about that. He often made that point when I served under him on the Select Committee. I, too, am convinced that we will see real improvements when we have much greater integration of health and social services in my right hon. Friend's constituency and mine.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for recognising the special qualities of the Staffordshire ambulance service. Will he give me the assurance, which he was not able to give my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), that there will be no question of merger unless the neighbouring merged ambulance service has reached at least the standard of Staffordshire in two years' time?

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely important point. He can see from the proposals that we have recognised the strong concerns expressed by him and some of my hon. Friends. The public in Staffordshire clearly feel a strong attachment to their ambulance service, and rightly so. We have stated clearly that merger is expected within a period of time. I am not going to lay a time frame on that today, but he makes the legitimate point that we would not want Staffordshire ambulance service's standards to be eroded in any way.

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I, too, welcome my hon. Friend's statement. The people of Staffordshire will be pleased that Ministers have listened and that there has been a true consultation. Up to two years will certainly allow time for the West Midlands ambulance service and the Staffordshire ambulance service to be aligned and for protocols to be developed, which I hope will maintain the excellent service. However, if a little more time is needed, I hope that Ministers will consider extending it. Ministers have truly listened, so thank you.

Andy Burnham: I am grateful for those comments—more like it would be much appreciated—and for my hon. Friend's measured words. I am happy to give her the assurance that although we expect merger to be right in due course, I hear what she says. I will relay her words to Lord Warner, who has done a great deal of work to bring about the proposals.

Not long ago I was a customer of Staffordshire ambulance service following a crash on the M6. The standard of care was exceptional and the standard of support provided by the paramedics on site was fantastic. I have good personal reason to endorse fully what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): North Yorkshire PCT will be the third largest in the country with a population at 765,000, behind only Hampshire and Surrey, yet it covers a huge county of scattered communities. Will the Minister ensure that it is gospel with the new PCT that it should do everything it can to reinforce its working relationships at the local level? If it does not, my constituents will conclude that the Government's only intention is to drain services to a larger regional level, as they have done with the police, with the loss of accountability and of sheer local personality that make public services so valued.

Andy Burnham: The right hon. Gentleman makes an important point. May I refer him to my statement, in which I gave a clear commitment to ensure that structures are in place in the new organisations so that local concerns can be aired or voiced? I therefore agree with him on that point. The new PCT is one of the larger PCTs that have been created today, with the benefit that it has a significant ability to drive up standards for residents. The important thing is to get the balance right, and we believe that, bearing in mind the points that he has made, we have done so.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I accept the logic of coterminosity between social and health services, but I congratulate my hon. Friend on acknowledging that in some circumstances common sense dictates a different solution—hence the retention of Tameside and Glossop PCT, which has the support of 99 per cent. of respondents to the consultation. Does he agree that such modifications of coterminosity will test the principle of local area agreements—it is none the worse for that—and that areas such as Glossop should not be disadvantaged by the emphasis on local area agreements and local commissioning?

Andy Burnham: May I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's efforts to ensure that the voice of people in his constituency, particularly in Glossop, is heard? He is quite right that there are occasional exceptions for people with health ties that do not fit the local government structure. Knowing the area well, I can say that Glossop is one such location. Traditionally, people have travelled north-west into Manchester for hospital care, but technically they are not within the region's local government boundaries. We have listened to my hon. Friend's concerns, and we have made an exception, as we recognise that people in the area lean towards the north-west for health care. However, he is right that that exception does not challenge the other structures that have been put in place to improve services on the ground.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): In addition to their local commissioning and partnership functions, how many national targets will the PCTs still have to monitor and report on? In the new, reorganised NHS, approximately how many staff will be deployed in that role?

Andy Burnham: I would make a staunch defence of targets. By providing clarity from the centre, we have been able to deliver improvements to the NHS in recent years, so I make no apology for them. However, the hon. Gentleman will know that we have reduced the number of targets and have set fewer priorities, as we need to focus on our true priorities. It is the new PCTs' job to ensure delivery of standards. Throughout the process, I am pleased that there has been continued improvement in NHS patient care, and I fully expect the new organisational structure to continue to drive change for patients' benefit.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I firmly believe that the development of primary care trusts has developed a system for GPs that promotes innovation and exciting programmes to improve people's health in our constituencies, and I congratulate Crawley PCT on its work. How can we ensure that GPs who are determined to drive up standards in a larger PCT can do so and can continue to work with local authorities so that everyone benefits from the new PCT?

Andy Burnham: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. General practitioners in her area are at the forefront of leading practice to develop good services at community level. It is a priority for everyone, wherever possible, to deliver services away from the hospital setting and closer to the patient's home. I fully endorse that as the way forward, and I applaud the work on the ground in her area. Within the new structure, we are introducing practice-based commissioning. That change will put power in the hands of local GPs to drive improvements in their area, so it should give more power to their elbow than they have at present. That is what I would like to see as a result of these changes.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Given that half the beds at Sevenoaks hospital that were temporarily closed in February for financial reasons have now shamefully been removed altogether, what reassurance can the Minister give me that good local hospitals will be any safer inside larger PCTs?

Andy Burnham: The point of the changes is to ensure that PCTs can take a balanced view across a broad area to ensure that patient services are most effectively provided. He would be the first to complain if local priorities were overridden from the centre by targets or central diktat. It is right that at local level people should be able to create the kind of health service they want. Through foundation trusts we want to give local people much greater ownership, control and say over how their hospitals provide services. Ultimately, that is the way in which local people and local communities will have their say over the configuration of hospital services.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): Great concern has been expressed in Leeds about the continued development of the strong local focus of the five PCTs. Will my hon. Friend ensure that any savings realised as part of the reconfiguration in Leeds are re-invested in Leeds to develop that local focus still further?

Andy Burnham: As my hon. Friend knows, the changes will lead to a Leeds PCT that could provide a powerful voice for local communities across the Leeds area. I am happy to confirm that the savings that will be made as a result of the changes will be directly released for patient care. That is the very reason we are making the changes. We must achieve a balance so that an organisational structure is the right size and is not unnecessarily duplicating back-office functions. Where savings are released, they will be ploughed back into patient care at the front line.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Blackwater Valley and Hart PCT and North Hampshire PCT have just gone through a painful reorganisation. They already cover a population of 385,000—50,000 higher than the average PCT that the Minister is creating. Now he wants to foist on Hampshire yet another period of turbulence. Can he explain in practical terms how he will deliver the local focus of which he speaks? In particular, how will he ensure that the PCT covering 800,000 people in Hampshire specifically looks after the interests of my constituents, who are served by a hospital in Surrey, next door? That is the question to which they will need the answer tonight, please.

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. Competing demands must be balanced in reaching the right judgment. Those demands are local focus, responsiveness to local need, a commissioner who has the weight and the power to drive a good bargain and get good commissioning for local people, and together with all those things, coterminosity with social service providers so that we can get joined services at local level. Some of those pressures are pulling in opposite directions and it is difficult to get them into balance. That is why we have no blueprint specifying that a PCT must be a particular size and shape in a particular locality. We have sought to do the best we can to manage the competing priorities. I am pleased to say that in the hon. Gentleman's area there was strong support for a Hampshire PCT coterminous with the local authority boundaries.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for his statement. I join the growing number of hon. Members in all parts of the House thanking him for its content in relation to the reconfiguration of primary care trusts. I specifically thank him for rejecting the proposal from the Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority to remove existing coterminosity and create even less, and for listening to the opinion of every local council, every local trust, their staff, Members of Parliament, voluntary community organisations, GPs and just about everybody who thought that that proposal was unwise. I thank the Government for making a sound decision.

Andy Burnham: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind words. People have long complained about a democratic deficit within the NHS, and I hope that some of the proposals that we have announced today and campaigns run on the ground by elected representatives throughout the country will show that the NHS can respond to local concerns and put in place a structure in local communities in which people feel confident and with which people identify.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Minister has talked about the need for strong community support and coterminosity. Perhaps he will explain which organising genius at the centre of Government has produced a PCT for Surrey, which is welcome, but managed to remove the police, fire and ambulance services from boundaries within Surrey in the same period.

Andy Burnham: This is my second week in the job, and I have just discovered that I am not responsible for police, fire or other emergency services. However, I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman recognises [illegible] our NHS structure is the right way to go in Surrey.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): My hon. Friend has given the House absolutely brilliant news on Staffordshire ambulance services and I am grateful to him and the rest of the ministerial team for listening to the people of Staffordshire. Will he confirm that Staffordshire ambulance service will remain operationally independent and that it will have its own trust board and its own chief officer, so that it can continue to run its system, which is completely different from those used by other ambulance services in the country? Will he also confirm that no merger will take place unless Staffordshire ambulance service agrees to it and unless the west midlands service comes up to the standard of the Staffordshire service, which delivers the fastest response times in the country?

Andy Burnham: I am grateful for another bouquet from the Back Benches, but, before I am accused of being a fraud for accepting them, I must point out that many people in my Department have been working on the proposals. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) has been in close discussions with people in the Department—I am, perhaps, the only person who has not been in detailed discussions with her, so it is not right for me to accept all the congratulations, which I shall relay to the rest of the Department. She knows health issues in detail—I have worked with her on other matters—and I know how passionately she believes in the health service in her area. She has run a good campaign and has expressed her concerns extremely well. We have said that a merger should be the eventual goal, and I am happy to give her the assurances that she seeks on the operating structures of the two services. My noble Friend Lord Warner will judge those issues, but it makes sense to have agreement in the region when any further change is made to the structure.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The consultation document on the creation of the North West ambulance service did not contain a business case with real numbers to justify the assertion that resources will be available for the service improvements that the Minister mentioned in his statement. When I asked the excellent Lancashire ambulance service for details on that point, it could not help either. The Minister must have seen a business case to convince him that his decision is right. Will he assure the House that the details will be placed in the Library, so we can all understand where the resources will come from and be sure that good services, such as Lancashire ambulance service, will not be drained of resources to prop up those that are not so good?

Andy Burnham: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we will put into the public domain any information that we can to show the basis on which those decisions were taken, but he knows that the structure proposed by Peter Bradley commanded strong support within the ambulance service. People want to be part of a service that can invest its resources in front-line services and in improving the professional development of its staff. A unified ambulance service in the north-west will lead to an improved level of service for his constituents and for mine. I hope that we can share that information, but, as I have said, it is vital that residents across the north-west can look forward to service improvements as a result of the changes. However, the right hon. Gentleman must accept that savings can be made by merging the back-office functions of existing ambulance services.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): May I give two cheers for my hon. Friend's announcement about Staffordshire ambulance service? It is the best performing ambulance service in the country, and it would have been inexplicable to have merged it. The Government deserve great credit for not forcing such a merger. Will my hon. Friend get a third cheer by giving the assurance for which he has been asked on several occasions—that no merger in future, whether in 2008 or at any other time, will take place until the standard of the service with which it is intended to merge has reached the standards, including the response time standards, of the Staffordshire service? That is the crucial guarantee that my hon. Friend has to give.

Andy Burnham: I thank my hon. Friend for his two cheers. Again, I will pass them on to others who have worked on this. The crucial test in judging changes to an ambulance service is, first, that the service is viable and, secondly, that it is providing a safe service to all the residents in the area. Those are the guiding principles on which any further changes will be made. As I said to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), any further change would be about ensuring that service standards could be further improved. We recognise the improvements in service standards that Staffordshire has reached; that is why we are happy to make the decisions that we announced. I hear what my hon. Friend has said. In going forward with any further change, we must be clear that it is about improving service standards to all the residents of Staffordshire and the west midlands.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Can the Minister confirm that the effect of his announcement is that, in future, commissioning in the health service will be the responsibility of roughly the same number of regional health authorities that the Government inherited in 1997 and renamed strategic health authorities, of roughly the same number of health authorities that the Government inherited in 1997 and renamed primary care trusts, or importantly—in this I agree with the Government—when in the hands of GP fundholders renamed primary care commissioners? Does this mean that we got it roughly right?

Andy Burnham: I am intrigued by the right hon. Gentleman's line of questioning. There are very important differences, as we said in exchanges across the Floor of the House last week, between GP fundholding and the Conservative model— whereby, for completely arbitrary reasons, people had differential access to hospital treatment—and the practice-based commissioning model that we are introducing through these new reforms. Under the right hon. Gentleman's leadership, the NHS had a bizarre paper chase involving a whole process of red tape and people chasing invoices around the system. I am happy and proud to say that we will certainly not replicate that in our NHS.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I congratulate the Secretary of State on rejecting Trent strategic health authority's aggressive campaign for a single Nottinghamshire-wide PCT and instead listening to the many thousands of my constituents who queued up to sign my petition for our PCT to remain on its own. Can the Minister assure the House that that practice of listening to the people will underpin the way in which we run the health service in future?

Andy Burnham: I know that my hon. Friend has run a characteristically dogged and tenacious campaign on this issue and that he did indeed present a very large petition to the Department. As I said, that shows that the new PCTs have commanded a great deal of support and that people are identifying with those organisations as providers of health care. I will of course pass on to the Secretary of State the points that he raised. He is absolutely right to say that as the NHS goes forwards, it needs to show that it can listen and, where possible, make changes to respond to local communities.

Point of Order

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, of which I have given you notice. What can you do to help us to restore the reputations of our constituents once they have been badly maligned in this House? I give you the example of a debate on the Child Support Agency on 17 January, when the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) referred to my constituent, a Miss Eva Peterson, as a Russian internet bride. He then went on to catalogue the failures of her partner for failing to provide for the child of a constituent of his. Miss Peterson is as far from being a Russian internet bride as it is possible to be. She is a professional woman, a PhD and a former mayor of a major city in Russia. The Petersons are also subject to a campaign of harassment from the hon. Gentleman's constituent, which has resulted in a court order barring her from making further contact. What can you do, Mr. Speaker, to help us to restore that reputation; and is it not a convention of this House that if our constituents are going to be criticised by an hon. Member we should be informed in advance?

Mr. Speaker: All hon. Members are responsible for the words that they use in the Chamber, unless they are unparliamentary, in which case I will intervene. I cannot therefore be drawn into this matter. It would be impractical if hon. Members had to notify the constituency MP of everyone who was mentioned, be they the director of a company or an executive in a health authority, if they resided in another constituency. That would not be helpful or easy to do. However, the hon. Gentleman is the constituency MP concerned in this case, and he has now been able to put the record straight. That will help the reputation of his constituent.

Housing and Commercial Development (Water Supply Assessment)

4.31 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require an assessment to be made, before construction, of the water supply requirements resulting from housing and commercial development.

The House has not yet created a mechanism for declaring a non-interest. However, I should like to make such a declaration. As the chairman of a water company, I ought not to be keen on restricting the amount of water that can be sold. As we have seen from today's newspaper headlines, however, we are facing a serious water shortage arising from a wide range of reasons. Because of global warming, our precipitation level is now lower, and the precipitation arrives in much more concentrated amounts. It therefore runs off the land into the rivers and out to sea much more quickly than before.

There is no doubt that we face real difficulties relating to our water supply. This comes as a surprise to people abroad, who think of Britain as a nation in which water is ever-present. I was in Paris on Monday, and a senior official there commented that he was now convinced about global warming largely because it appeared that it no longer rained in Britain. That might be an unusual, French way of looking at the issue, but it underlines the seriousness of the situation.

This is not a party political comment, but I was surprised to discover that there is no statutory reason why anyone building an estate or a commercial building, for example, should ascertain in advance that the water supply and sewerage infrastructure for the site will be adequate. He will want to know that connection is possible, but he does not need to ascertain whether the system will bear the additional weight of his development.

The Government are proposing to bring 750,000 more people into the Thames Gateway, yet, as far as I can discover, they have made no direct assessment of the ability to provide either a water supply or sewerage facilities for those new homes. Let us take the town of Ashford as a further example. At first, it was proposed to build a significant number of new houses there. Only when the local authority was able to prove that neither the water supply nor the sewerage infrastructure would be adequate was that number cut substantially. Throughout the country, development goes ahead without those fundamental questions being asked.

When introducing the sustainable communities document, the Government failed to discuss water at all with anyone. Several years of consideration of that document had taken place before formal discussions were conducted with Water UK or anyone else. That shows how unimportant water has been either in the psyche of the nation or in the Government's understanding.

It is interesting that Members of all parties represented in the House are among the supporters of this ten-minute Bill, including nationalist, Liberal, Conservative and Labour Members. Among them are those who hold shadow responsibility and who have until recently held Government responsibility for environmental matters. One of the reasons for that is the divorce between what was the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and is now the Department for Communities and Local Government—I am one of the few who can remember that distinction—and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. Since the sidelining of DEFRA, so that it no longer has a direct influence and control over these matters, issues such as water have become much less important than the aggrandisement of what was the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

I want to make sure that the seriousness of the current situation is brought home to the nation. To build without being able to provide water or sewerage facilities, often in areas that will also be plagued by flooding, is sheer folly. One of the things that many of our constituents do not understand is that we can have both drought and floods in the present circumstances. We can have a shortage of water and yet be plagued by a damaging excess of it. We must therefore start—and continue with retrofitting—with the new homes, office and factories being built. Unless we ask the fundamental questions, which the Bill seeks to ensure that we do, we shall not get the right answers. If we do not ask whether there is enough water for such homes, we only have ourselves to blame when such homes get constricted because of drought and water scarcity regulations.

Of course, that would entail an important role for the water company and the Environment Agency, which would together produce that assessment. If a water company says that it can provide water for a new development, that gives the owner of a new house or commercial premises a clear, bankable indication that he can carry on his home or commercial life without interruption. The fact that the Environment Agency will have to support that will ensure that there is a proper implied contract for the owner of a new home or commercial premises. At the moment, the day after a family moves into a new home, the local water company can say, "Frightfully sorry, but we haven't got enough water for you." I hope that that does not happen, but the situation is becoming increasingly sharp and difficult.

It is not possible to overestimate the state of our water supplies. Three local water companies are considering or asking for planning permission for desalination plants—in this country, Britain—which we thought were an unfortunate necessity in the middle east and beyond. That is one of the immediate effects of climate change. Given the inadequacy of the Government's response to climate change, that will get worse, not better. Unless we take these practical, simple measures to ensure that such matters are highlighted, we will not be able to defend future generations from a water shortage that will leave them in a position that we never thought would be experienced in Britain in 100 years. Standpipes for much of the south and centre of Britain are something that we did not expect to see at all, yet we are proposing to inject into the area where standpipes are being threatened yet more housing, to the tune of up to 4 million homes.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Madness!

Mr. Gummer: In this context, "madness" is a very polite term. I am sorry to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I would put it more clearly. The Government must take this more seriously. I am sorry that it has been left to a Back-Bench Member of Parliament to propose the Bill. This is a simple matter, but it is a matter of gaining information that is necessary not only to the developer, the home owner and the owner of a business but to the nation as a whole, so that we do not develop where water is not available and where flooding is a real risk.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Gummer, Mr. Peter Ainsworth, Mrs. Caroline Spelman, Mr. Tim Yeo, Mr. Michael Meacher, Mr. Elliot Morley, Andrew Stunell, Hywel Williams and Mr. Nick Hurd.

Housing and Commercial Development (Water Supply Assessment)

Mr. John Gummer accordingly presented a Bill to require an assessment to be made, before construction, of the water supply requirements resulting from housing and commercial development. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 July, and to be printed [Bill 182].

Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill

Third Report from the Public Administration Select Committee, Session 2005-06, Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, HC 1033.]

As amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just collected from the board a letter from the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), dated 16 May, in which he says that during yesterday's Report stage debate there was a discussion about the power in new clause 1 to remove or reduce burdens. It is reported in columns 782 and 783 of Hansard. He says

"At the beginning of the debate on the same Bill in the chamber today, I shall provide further clarification on this specific point."

I hope that the Minister will have an opportunity to make that clarification now, so that we can reflect on it before we reach Third Reading later today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I have seen the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I am sorry to disappoint him, but my advice is that it would not be appropriate for the Minister to make such statements at this point in the proceedings. There are other ways in which he may do so.

Mr. Chope: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you be prepared to indicate when it might be appropriate for the Minister to make the clarification available, so that we have it before the start of the Third Reading debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are a number of ways in which the Minister may do that. I cannot go through them all now, but clearly this is not the point at which he should do it. Matters have moved on since the measure was first debated in the Chamber, but there are ways in which this can be done, which the hon. Gentleman can discover for himself and of which the Minister will also be aware.

REPORT ON OPERATION OF ACT

'Before the end of the six months beginning with the day on which this Act is passed and annually thereafter, the Secretary of State must prepare and lay before Parliament a report setting out his estimate of the extent to which orders, rules and schemes made pursuant to this Act have—

(a) removed or reduced any burden,

(b) re-enacted any provision having the effect of imposing any burden, in cases where the burden was proportionate to the benefit that was expected to result from such re-enactment,

(c) made any new provision having the effect of imposing a burden that has affected any person in the carrying on of the activity, but was proportionate to the benefit that was expected to result from its creation, or

(d) removed inconsistencies and anomalies in legislation.'.—[Mr. Harper.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.43 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 7—Expiry—

'Part 1 of this Act shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of five years beginning with the day on which it is brought into force.'.

New clause 24—Renewal by Parliament of part 1—

'(1) Before the end of each subsequent period of two years following Royal Assent of the Act Ministers must bring Part 1 before Parliament to be re-approved or rejected by resolution.

(2) If, within each two-year period, Ministers do not bring Part 1 before Parliament, pursuant to subsection (1), it will cease to have effect.

(3) If Parliament re-approves Part 1 by resolution, pursuant to subsection (1), it will have effect for the subsequent two-year period.

(4) If Parliament rejects Part 1 by resolution, pursuant to subsection (1), it will cease to have effect.'.

Mr. Harper: New clause 2 aims to inject a shot of transparency into the Bill. It provides for a report on the operation of the Act. It follows recommendation 2 of the Regulatory Reform Committee's report on the Bill, which stated

"We reaffirm the recommendation of our predecessor Committee that Departments should be assessed on their progress in removing unnecessary regulations and controls and not simply on their progress in simplifying measures. We recommend accordingly."

Transparency is something on which we all agree. Allowing the greatest possible visibility for a process encourages good government and sound decision making; allowing decisions to be made behind closed doors in Whitehall has the potential, as we all know, to have the opposite effect. Deregulation and better regulation are such important agendas that we must shine the light of scrutiny into the dark recesses of departmental decision making.

In the Committee debates, in which I participated, the Minister was very proud of the Government's agenda. He said on 2 March:

"As a Government, we have committed ourselves to one of the most radical regulatory reform packages anywhere in the world".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 2 March 2006; c. 125.]

and he specifically talked about the culture change that he wished to inculcate in Whitehall. It seems to me that the best way of doing that is to ensure that as much light as possible is shone on the measures in the Act in respect of reducing regulations and burdens on business.

The Regulatory Reform Committee suggested that one of the key reasons why the regulatory reform orders introduced under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 had been far from successful was the lack of political will within Whitehall. The Committee claimed that low political importance was attached by Ministers and civil servants to propose areas ripe for regulatory reform as compared with bringing new legislation before the House. As the Minister acknowledged in Committee, a culture change in Whitehall is necessary and it should not be viewed as preferable for civil servants and Ministers to pin their careers on creating regulations and legislation rather than tidying up existing rules and scrapping obsolete or disproportionate burdens. Indeed, the latter is of far greater benefit to business than the former.

The new clause would help to bring about the necessary culture change. It would require the Secretary of State to publish an annual report and lay it before Parliament, which would provide the opportunity for the House to debate what Ministers would view as the Government's success in reducing burdens. The report would detail what orders had been made and to what effect; what burdens had been removed, what simplified and what other progress had been made. The Government would therefore have to set out in stark detail exactly how deregulatory or regulatory they have been. That should provide a strong incentive for Ministers to encourage and prioritise measures that deregulate and reduce burdens on business, rather than the opposite, which seems the case at the moment.

I shall deal now with new clauses 7 and 24. New clause 7 is effectively a sunset clause, which suggests sunsetting the Bill after five years. We make too little use of post-legislative scrutiny in the House and in this country, although we are getting better at employing pre-legislative scrutiny. The new clause would represent an important step forward in allowing Parliament and interest groups to input into legislation before it is finalised. We do not do enough to monitor the effectiveness of laws after they are on the statute book. A sunset clause is one form of post-legislative scrutiny; it is clearly not desirable for all legislation to include it because the increased work load on Parliament would be prohibitive. In certain cases, however, there is a clear argument for having sunset clauses, particularly for important and controversial legislation. Control orders immediately spring to mind. Sunset clauses can allow Parliament to look again at legislation and see if it wants to bring it back into force.

As an alternative, new clause 24 is not a sunset clause, but a renewal clause, providing a separate option for increasing post-legislative scrutiny of the Bill and the Government may find it more amenable. Under the new clause, part 1 of the Bill, the most important part, must be brought before Parliament for reapproval or rejection at least every two years.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I welcome the hon. Gentleman back to our consideration of the Bill, as we missed him yesterday. Will he confirm that neither of his new clauses will have the effect of sunsetting any of its legislative provisions? All they would do is to sunset the power to make the orders. One would have to go a little further to achieve the end, which I believe both his party and mine share, of sunsetting the majority of new regulations.

Mr. Harper: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, and for what I think was a compliment. Unfortunately, I was unable to take part in yesterday's debate on the Bill because I had already organised a full day's meeting of a number of veterans' organisations, at which we discussed very important policy matters. The hon. Gentleman is quite right: the new clauses would affect simply part 1 of the Bill and would not cause any measures passed under the Bill to fall. If Members want to achieve that objective, they will need to make further changes.

The advantage of new clause 24 is that it would allow Parliament regularly to reassess the effectiveness and proportionality of the part 1 order-making powers without creating an insurmountable hurdle to the Government's better regulation agenda. It would also provide an excellent opportunity to reassess just how successful the Government have been. In Committee, Members and the Minister referred many times to the 2001 Act being something of a disappointment in practice, saying that it had not been as successful in allowing deregulation as they had hoped. It would therefore be sensible to use this Bill to put on the statute book provisions compelling Ministers to come to the House more regularly, so that we do not have to come here yet again in four or five years' time—under a different Administration, hopefully—to discuss another Bill to reduce the burdens on business.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): May I set at rest the mind of the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper)? I am quite sure that I speak for my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) when I say that his earlier comment was a compliment, rather than an attempt to deprecate the hon. Gentleman's absence. We genuinely missed the hon. Gentleman, who made a valuable contribution in Committee and has made another one today in introducing these new clauses, dealing as they do with transparency and openness. They also make an at least crude attempt to apply a degree of post-legislative scrutiny to this part of the Bill.

In the spirit of openness and transparency, I would have liked to have had a letter in similar terms to that referred to earlier by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). I am little surprised to learn that Liberal Democrat Front Benchers were not accorded that courtesy on this occasion; perhaps the letter is somewhere in transmission at this very moment. One would usually expect to be copied into correspondence dealing with the substance of a Bill.

As the hon. Member for Forest of Dean correctly said, new clause 2 requires that a report be made by the Secretary of State on the Bill's operation. Previous deregulatory legislation—indeed, all sorts of legislation—has not lived up to its expectations. For instance, one of my continuing criticisms is the raft of Home Office legislation, to which I referred in yesterday's debate. Large parts of it were described as urgent matters that needed the House's attention and which were absolutely crucial to the well-being and safety of the population—however, years later they still have not been implemented. If such provisions are urgently needed and vital to public safety, one has to ask why they have not been implemented.

Similarly, in dealing with this legislation, we are entitled to ask, after a period, what the Government have done with this power. Have they used it effectively? Do we have a programme of deregulation, or is the power being used in abeyance as a reserve power—as with the change to Standing Orders in order to implement Law Commission reports, to which reference was made yesterday—rather than to achieve the objectives that we and the Government share? I therefore think that new clause 2 has a great deal to commend it.

I come now to the issue of sunset clauses. In his intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge was right to distinguish between the powers that lapse as a result of a sunset clause and the orders introduced under those powers. If the Bill becomes an Act, Ministers may be tempted to argue against its renewal on the ground that we would thus be left defenceless against overburdensome legislation and regulation. However, that argument would be spurious, as there is nothing in this and other new clauses in the group that would cause the regulations or the deregulation made under the powers contained in the Bill to be annulled. They would merely enable the House to consider whether assurances given by the Government during the Bill's passage had been implemented in practice. They would allow us to determine whether promises had been kept and the Bill's purposes adhered to, and to ascertain whether we had the sort of deregulatory programme and the lack of excess that the Government have assured us all along was their intention.

That is a modest ambition. In one way, it might be a desirable concept to sunset all regulations from their origin, but that might run the risk of causing administrative chaos. We understand the complexity of the drafting required to produce a satisfactory response, but the lapsing of a power would not create immediate difficulties. The new clause means that the Government would be required to come back to the House and say to hon. Members, "This is how we have used this power. You have seen it in action, and will understand that it was used entirely properly and for its intended purpose. It has worked well, and we ask the House to renew it." Alternatively, the House could say to the Government, "You told us that you would use the power for one purpose, but in fact you have used it for quite another" or, "You told us this power was needed urgently, yet you have not used it at all." The new clause would enable the House to have control of what the Executive want to do.

I would always argue that the legislature should have control of what the Executive do, especially in respect of the procedures of this House. More than anything else, the Bill is about those procedures. It is therefore entirely appropriate for Parliament to decide whether a power is working satisfactorily, and I am happy to lend my support to the suggestions made by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I have some sympathy with what the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) said, given that he rightly referred to recommendations in the Select Committee report, but I should like to propose a better way than new clause 2 to achieve the sort of reporting that he described.

The Select Committee looked at this matter long and hard. Yesterday, I referred to the table in the report showing how long orders float around some Departments. We are not at present competent to deal with that or to instigate investigations to determine why it happens. The existing Standing Orders do not allow us to summons a Secretary of State and ask why an order has been floating around for weeks and months. The hon. Gentleman's objective would probably be better achieved by building a more robust approach into the Standing Orders of the Regulatory Reform Committee or its successor body so that we can investigate why such failures have occurred, rather than by introducing a reporting function, which would result in the type of report that is normal in such circumstances. I am being gentle because I have read reports from Administrations of both my colour and his.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I admired the section of the Select Committee's report on that issue and I support the excellent point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper). In discussing the review in your Committee, did you address the question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Committee or to the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), but he must get his parliamentary terminology correct.

Mr. Djanogly: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was referring to the Committee.

Was there any discussion in the Committee of the proportion of time spent by Departments on deregulation or regulation, and should that be a matter for review?

Andrew Miller: We looked specifically at the history of the then 27 orders that had been dealt with and, with the limited information we had, tried to ascertain why delays occurred in some Departments. We found that we could report on the facts of a delay, but that we could not investigate the reasons, so if it is the will of the House I should like the opportunity for my Committee to act like a normal Select Committee and inquire into the workings of a Department by, for example, periodically inviting its Secretary of State to answer questions.

The sunset clause proposed by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean would take us back a long way. The Better Regulation Executive produced a paper, "A Bill for Better regulation: Consultation Document", which acknowledged that the powers in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 are "constitutionally ground-breaking", noted that the review had "identified many positive aspects" in the process and described where further improvements could be made. The danger of introducing a sunset clause is that we could throw the baby out with the bathwater. I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there should be a review of the process—indeed, of all legislation.

Mr. Harper: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that remark. New clauses 7 and 24 are very much either/or provisions. New clause 7—the sunset clause—may go a little too far, but new clause 24, which provides an opportunity for renewal after two years and would not automatically put an end to the whole Bill, might be more to his liking.

Andrew Miller: I realise that the hon. Gentleman could not be in the Chamber yesterday, but I expressed then my fear that the existence of the process he describes in new clause 24 would create inertia in some Departments that would worsen the chances of advancing the regulation process. I think that he and I—and, indeed, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath)—share the desire to deregulate constructively wherever possible, but I want to find solutions that will not create that inertia in Departments. I therefore urge the hon. Member for Forest of Dean to move away from either of those concepts.

My hon. Friend the Minister and I have not spoken about this subject—he has had to absorb rather a lot from me in a very few days—but I will throw another googly at him and suggest that perhaps it might be sensible for the Government to give a commitment to allow an opportunity, either on the Floor of the House or through my Committee or the other relevant Committees, to hold periodic discussions on the active working of such legislation. If we are to get it right and make it work in all our interests, we need such a mechanism. On the one hand, I do not want to create a situation that allows any excuse inside any part of the Administration to slow down the process, but on the other, I do not want a process that over-complicates the situation for those outside the House who are trying to understand what is necessarily a pretty complex process.

Mr. Harper: The hon. Gentleman was present at most of the deliberations in Committee, so he will be aware that the then Minister gave an undertaking that

"a Minister of the Crown will report to the House no less than five years after enactment on the operation of the proposed Legislative and Regulatory Reform Act."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 9 March 2006; c. 289.]

The then Minister conceded that reporting back to the House after a certain period was reasonable, but five years seems far too long—hence new clause 2, which requires an annual report to the House. It would probably be helpful when the Minister speaks to the new clause if he could confirm the commitment given by his predecessor and make that clear.

On the time that we are talking about, the previous approach—the 2001 Act did not contain a sunset clause—does not seem to have spurred a culture change in the civil service and the Government for urgency. If the legislation was in force for a fixed period, it would give the Minister the opportunity to say to civil servants, "We've got a limited period to act and I want to see firm proposals"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the point has been made.

Andrew Miller: I have sort of got the point, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

If the hon. Gentleman is seeking to run an auction between him and me about the length of time after which my hon. Friend the Minister ought to report to the House, perhaps we ought to start now. I agree that five years is a long time. Certainly, a serious review of such mechanisms ought to be conducted within the lifetime of a Parliament because this is an important issue—and leaving aside all the bluster of yesterday, there is an earnest desire on both sides of the House to make some progress.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): How would a periodic review be timetabled? Would not a sunset clause create an imperative for a review that could not be fudged?

Andrew Miller: I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the relationship between my hon. Friend the Minister and other hon. Members, but that is not the only relationship that matters—what matters is what happens daily in Departments in the quest for sensible deregulatory mechanisms. We want to raise that profile higher. We do not want to create any excuse for people to say, "Ah, well, we ought to put that one on ice because the sunset clause is triggering a review process in a few weeks' time." That is my concern. With those few remarks, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can make the kind of comments that I have suggested, with a view to ensuring that the spirit of the two points that we have addressed can be dealt with sensibly and constructively.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Pat McFadden): I do not feel that there will be a great difference between us on this subject. There is a lot of sense in what was said by the hon. Members for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller). We agree about the need for review and the need to examine how the measures in the Bill will operate. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean asked me about previous assurances. With regard to new clause 2, I am happy to repeat the Government undertaking made in Committee that a Minister of the Crown will report to the House on the operation of the Bill no less than five years after enactment.

Of course I support the notion that the Government should constantly be looking to see how well their reforms are working. We are already taking action in that regard. The Government have proposed an amendment requiring that explanatory documents for all orders made under new clause 19 should include an assessment of the extent to which the order removes or reduces burdens.

Mr. Walker : The Minister said "no less than five years". Did he mean to say that he would report back after no more than five years?

Mr. McFadden: As I understand it, the assurance given in Committee was that a Minister would report back after no less than five years, and I am happy to repeat that today.

Mr. Heath rose—

Mr. McFadden: I would like to make some progress.

The Government also believe that all Departments should keep their legislation under review. That is why the Government set up the panel for regulatory accountability, and why there are regulatory reform Ministers in each of the main regulatory Departments—and a Better Regulation Commission keeping an eye on them all.

Mr. Walker: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I am afraid that I would like to make some progress.

Departments are currently reviewing their regulations and drafting simplification plans, which include measures to reduce administrative burdens on business. Those will be published in the pre-Budget report later this year. The Better Regulation Commission will review the simplification plans that Departments and some independent regulators are preparing. The review will occur while the plans are in final draft form and before they go for clearance by the panel for regulatory accountability. The important thing is that Departments are already obliged to report on their better regulation work as part of their annual reports. They have been required to do that for the past two years. We would expect departmental Select Committees to report on those annual reports as appropriate.

Mr. Djanogly: Is not the Minister rather missing the point? The Bill is being introduced because the reports and the procedures have not been working to date. That is why we need new procedures.

Mr. McFadden: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the reason behind the Bill is that we must make greater progress than has been made under the 2001 Act. My point is that the Bill will not be the only measure, and that efforts are being made to achieve simplification. Although I agree that we should be open to reviewing orders, I believe that it would be unnecessarily prescriptive, and indeed unnecessary, to include that provision in the Bill.

As hon. Members will be aware, one of the main aims of the Bill is to provide a power to remove unnecessary burdens. To include yet another requirement in addition to those that I have already discussed could be argued to be contrary to the spirit and the purpose of the Bill—as I am sure at least some hon. Members will agree.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): As a former member of the Regulatory Reform Committee, I agree with my hon. Friend about the prescriptive nature of new clause 2. However, with the increasing prominence of the idea of deregulation, if we are to show the political will to achieve deregulation and if we are to avoid the culture of Whitehall overcoming what we are trying to achieve, regular transparent reports to Parliament are a necessary reality.

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend makes a sound point. There must be a culture in Departments whereby that is a priority—a point made with great force yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston.

New clause 7 is a sunset clause. It would be inappropriate at this moment to set an arbitrary date for the expiry of part 1 of the Bill. Such a sunset clause would set a date on which the Act would certainly come to an end. The safeguards in the Bill and the rigorous parliamentary scrutiny that any proposal will undergo are robust. It would not be wise for us to introduce the uncertainty that a sunset provision would bring—although I am sure that we all relish the thought of going through this process again in five years.

5.15 pm

Mr. Heath: Of course we would love to have another go, because this has been such fun. May I bring the hon. Gentleman back to the reporting procedure? He is the Minister responsible not only for this aspect of deregulation but for better government practice. I made a suggestion yesterday—when speaking to amendment No. 75, I think—that was not really responded to: irrespective of statutory requirements, it would be good practice for Ministers who wish to introduce orders under the procedure to explain why they cannot use primary legislation to achieve the same effect. That would be a way of preventing Ministers from adopting a lazy attitude and thinking that the procedures in the Bill would provide an easy way of legislating, although they could draft a perfectly proper Bill, and ought to be using primary legislation.

Mr. McFadden: Some people who have examined the procedure that will emerge when the Bill is enacted do not think that it will be an easier process than primary legislation. It might be a more appropriate procedure on occasions. There may well be more consultation and debate on, and scrutiny of, some regulatory reform orders than would be the case for individual clauses in primary legislation, so we should not be prescriptive.

In Committee, the former Minister spoke of the need for a culture change across government. The approach that we need to take is one of partnership, with regulators and the regulated working together. What message would we be sending the business community, charities, the voluntary sector and public sector organisations affected by the Bill if we said that the deregulation scheme that it created would be killed off automatically after five years? I return again to the comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston about the pressures on Departments. Departments will be less likely to invest a lot of resources in pursuing reforms if they might not prove possible in the end. The culture change that we want should offer certainty about, and confidence in, methods of delivery.

People should be able to rely on primary legislation. They should know that if the Bill is passed, it is there to last. We want to avoid a situation in which those who are regulated by an order do not have confidence in its provisions. I hope that the orders will deliver wide-ranging reforms, as has already happened under the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005.

Mr. Heath: The Minister is straying into exactly the fallacy against which I warned earlier. The Conservative new clauses would bring no uncertainty to orders that have already been made, but would simply mean that the order-making process would have to be reviewed. The Minister's remarks are thus completely irrelevant to the proposition before him.

Mr. McFadden: We have said that there should be a review in no more than five years. However, we are not prepared to sign up to a sunset clause that would automatically bring the Bill to an end. We want Parliament to pass a power in which it has confidence, and that being the case, it should have confidence in that power for the future.

As I said, the Government have given an undertaking that a Minister of the Crown will report to the House on the operation of the Bill within five years of enactment. There is nothing in new clause 7 to ensure that orders made under part 1 would remain in force, if that is the intention. If they did not, everything done by means of them, including amendments to primary legislation, could be repealed. I can only assume that the intention is for existing orders to remain in force. However, unless there is an express provision to that effect, we cannot be free from doubt. That is why we had a "saving" provision to make it completely clear that when we repeal the 2001 Act, orders made under it will continue in force. Similar amendments were tabled when the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and the 2001 Act went through Parliament, and, specifically, the Conservative Administration resisted them during the passage of the 1994 Act.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Can we just clarify one thing? The Minister contradicted himself in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker), but I hope that he eventually corrected his slip of the tongue. On the undertaking to report to the House, the Minister confirmed that the report would appear in "not less" than five years. He seemed to be reassuring us that nothing would be embarked upon with undue haste—but my hon. Friend was trying to press him to say that he was undertaking that a report would be given in not more than five years' time. The Minister appeared to return to that idea later, but will he clarify what he meant?

Mr. McFadden rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I just clarify the fact that that was an intervention on the Minister and that the Minister has not quite finished? Is that right?

Mr. Clarke: It could be taken as a speech, in reply to which the Minister could apply for leave to speak again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that we will take it as an intervention.

Mr. McFadden: I am happy to confirm that the commitment is to report within five years.

Mr. Love: I was a little disappointed by the Minister's comments on new clause 2. As I said, although I do not propose to support it, because its terms are too prescriptive, there is considerable merit in the recommendation by the Select Committee on Regulatory Reform for regular parliamentary scrutiny of what the Bill achieves.

I have two major reasons, based on experiences for thinking that. First, I served on the Select Committee for about two to two and half years, although it felt a great deal longer. One of the things that would have made our work much more effective was greater transparency with regard to the lack of political will in Departments to achieve the objectives set out in legislation.

There is no doubt that one way to gain the attention of politicians and civil servants is to have transparency and a regular report to Parliament that allows us, the media and the public to know what is going on. That is important because deregulation has become a much higher political priority for everyone. We are constantly chided by the Opposition for our failures in deregulation, and we continually make commitments to do better. Looking back at the historical record, it is clear that previous Governments have not done that well, either; we all remember the "bonfire of the regulations" in the early 1990s. It behoves all of us in Parliament to create the conditions whereby we can succeed. The Bill does many things, but it does not achieve proper parliamentary scrutiny—I am talking about scrutiny in this Chamber—of what is being achieved.

The second consideration, as I said in an intervention, is the culture of Whitehall. It is undoubtedly the case that the priority both for politicians and for civil servants is creating new regulations and new laws. One becomes a Cabinet Minister by passing laws; one becomes a permanent secretary by assisting Ministers in passing laws. We need to try to create incentives to do away with laws as well as to create them. This measure is a small mechanism, but it is probably the only way in which we can change the culture of Whitehall and create a better opportunity to do away with regulation.

Mr. Harper: The hon. Gentleman spoke about how Ministers' performance is assessed. To achieve a culture change, we must shift our focus from the introduction of new Bills and legislation to deregulation and the removal of burdens from business. We must focus, too, on sound administration, and on paying attention to the need to get the operation of Acts of Parliament correct before rushing to introduce yet another Bill.

Mr. Love: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. I could add that much of the legislation passed by the House has not been properly thought through, as it has not been subjected to pre-legislative scrutiny and other mechanisms. Perhaps Parliament and the Government should consider passing not quite as much legislation, but making sure that the legislation that does proceed through the House is better thought through.

We should consider what straightforward measures we can take in the Bill to try to change the culture and make politicians and civil servants sit up and think before they carry on with their duties. I believe that an annual report to Parliament detailing progress under the Bill would assist that process a great deal.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): My hon. Friend makes a fair point. The Bill facilitates the sensible use of the order-making process, and we need to turn orders from the ugly ducklings of legislation into the swans. At the moment, the culture favours the introduction of Bills by Ministers and civil servants, but with the good use of orders we can change that culture.

Mr. Love: I agree.

The Minister has repeated an argument made in Committee that the requirement for an annual report to Parliament would impose an additional burden on Departments. I accept that that is generally true, but benefits would accrue from the work done by Departments to meet the priority imposed by Parliament, and thus help to change the culture. There is a great deal of merit in the proposal for an annual report. The report would be relatively straightforward to produce, but would give Parliament an opportunity to comment on the success of the Bill, or otherwise. We should remember that the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 both failed to achieve our objectives. If the Bill is to succeed, an amendment requiring an annual report would be helpful.

Mr. Harper: I am pleased that the new clause has been welcomed by Members on both sides of the House. In Committee, the Government said that they had the most ambitious deregulatory agenda in the world, so I would expect them to welcome the opportunity both to submit an annual report to the House setting out their achievements in reducing burdens on business and to discuss that with Members. Because Ministers would be forced to come to the House to report on progress every year, the proposal gives them a tool for insisting that civil servants take action. The Minister appeared to welcome new clause 2 in principle, when he said that the Government needed to report to the House more frequently than once every five years, but he did not give any concrete commitments. I must therefore insist on pressing new clause 2 to a Division.

Tellers for the Noes:
Jonathan Shaw and Mr. Frank Roy

Question accordingly negatived.

5.45 pm

Mr. Chope: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice. In Committee, the then Minister—now the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy)—gave an undertaking, at column 254, that he would produce a draft of the code of practice referred to in what is now clause 21, in good time for the Report stage so that Members would have a chance to look at it. We shall discuss clause 21 later this afternoon, and I wonder what can be done to ensure that the draft code of conduct is produced. It is still not forthcoming. Surely in such circumstances it would be appropriate for these proceedings to be adjourned pending the production of the draft document.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's point is really a matter for debate, and the issue will no doubt come out as we proceed this afternoon. Ministers will answer for themselves the points that he has raised.

Mr. Chope: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You rightly say that this is a matter for debate, but my concern is that, just as the Government talked out the last group of amendments last night, it might be their intention to talk out the amendments to part 2 this afternoon. We would not therefore even have the chance to debate the matter that I have raised.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is bearing out the point that I have just made. These issues are very much matters for debate, and they will come out in the debate.

DELAY IN PROCEEDINGS UNDER SECTION 13

'(1) Where within the period set out in section 13 either House of Parliament resolves that the content of an order is inappropriate for provision to be made under section [Power to remove or reduce burdens], there shall be no further proceedings in respect thereof.

(2) An order which has the same or similar effect to one that has previously been prevented from passing under the provisions of subsection (1) may not be laid under Part 1 within the subsequent two-year period.

(3) In this section, "two year period" means the period of two years beginning with the day on which the draft order was laid before Parliament under section 12.'. —[Mr. Djanogly.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Djanogly: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 6—Reference of order to Second Reading Committee—

'Where within the period referred to in section 13, either House of Parliament resolves that the content of an order is inappropriate for provision to be made under section 1 and that such order should be treated as a Bill, then the order may be deemed to be a Bill and shall be referred to a second reading committee.'.

New clause 14—Veto by specified number of Members of House of Commons—

'No order may be made under Part 1 where both of the following conditions have been fulfilled—

(a) within the period defined in section 13(7), more than 10 per cent. of the members of the House of Commons have signified to the Speaker in writing that they object to the use of the Act for purpose of introducing the order in question, and

(b) the members referred to in subsection (1) above are not all members of the same party.'.

No. 46, in page 8, line 17 [Clause 14], leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) The Minister may make an order in the terms of the draft order subject to the following provisions of this section.

(2A) The Minister may not make an order in the terms of the draft order if either House of Parliament so resolves within the 40-day period.

(2B) A committee of either House charged with reporting on the draft order may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend under this subsection that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.

(2C) A recommendation may be made under subsection (2B) only if the committee considers that—

(a) the provision made by the draft order does not serve the purpose specified in section (Power to remove or reduce burdens)(2), (Power to promote regulatory principles)(2) or (Power to implement Law Commission recommendations)(2) (as the case may be);

(b) any relevant condition in section 3(2) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(1); or

(c) the condition in section 3(4) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(3).

(2D) Where a recommendation is made by a committee of either House under subsection (2B) in relation to a draft order, the Minister may not make an order in the terms of the draft order unless the recommendation is, in the same Session, rejected by resolution of that House.'.

As Amendments to Hilary Armstrong's proposed Amendment (No. 46):—

(a), in line 5, leave out from 'with' to end of line 18 and insert

'responsibility for this matter may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.'.

Amendment (b), in line 9, leave out from beginning to end of line 18.

Amendment (c), in line 9, leave out from beginning to end of line 22.

Amendment (d), in line 20, leave out from first 'order' to 'the recommendation' in line 21 and insert

'no order may be made under this Part in the terms of the draft order unless either—

(a) before the order is made—

(i) at least two years have passed since the recommendation was made, and

(ii) the procedure to be observed under this Part has been observed anew, or

(b) '.

Government amendments Nos. 47 to 49

No. 50, in page 8, line 31 [Clause 15], at end insert—

'(2A) However, a committee of either House charged with reporting on the draft order may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend under this subsection that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.

(2B) A recommendation under subsection (2A) may be made only if the committee considers that—

(b) any relevant condition in section 3(2) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(1); or

(c) the condition in section 3(4) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(3).

(2C) Where a recommendation is made by a committee of either House under subsection (2A) in relation to a draft order, no proceedings may be taken in relation to the draft order in that House under subsection (2) unless the recommendation is, in the same Session, rejected by resolution of that House.'.

As Amendments to Hilary Armstrong's proposed Amendment (No. 50):—

Amendment (a), in line 1, leave out from 'with' to end of line 14 and insert

'responsibility for this matter may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.'.

Amendment (b), in line 5, leave out from beginning to end of line 14.

Amendment (c), in line 5, leave out from beginning to end of line 18.

Amendment (e), in line 16, leave out from 'no' to 'the recommendation' in line 17 and insert

'order may be made under this Part in the terms of the draft order unless either—

(a) before the order is made—

(i) at least two years have passed since the recommendation was made, and

(ii) the procedure to be observed under this Part has been observed anew, or

(b) '.

Amendment (d), in line 18, at end add—

'(2D) Where a draft order has been the subject of a recommendation under subsection (2A) and no further proceedings have been taken in the same Session, a Minister may not table a like draft Order within a period of two years after the day before the draft order was laid before Parliament pursuant to section 12.'.

Government amendments Nos. 51 to 53

No. 54, in page 9, line 8 [Clause 16], after subsection (4) insert—

'(4A) However, a committee of either House charged with reporting on the draft order may, at any time after the laying of a statement under subsection (3) and before the draft order is approved by that House under subsection (4), recommend under this subsection that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.

(4B) A recommendation under subsection (4A) may be made only if the committee considers that—

(b) any relevant condition in section 3(2) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(1); or

(c) the condition in section 3(4) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(3).

(4C) Where a recommendation is made by a committee of either House under subsection (4A) in relation to a draft order, no proceedings may be taken in relation to the draft order in that House under subsection (4) unless the recommendation is, in the same Session, rejected by resolution of that House.'.

As Amendments to Hilary Armstrong's proposed Amendment (No. 54):—

Amendment (a), in line 1, leave out from 'with' to end of line 14 and insert

'responsibility for this matter may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.'.

Amendment (b), in line 5, leave out from beginning to end of line 14.

Amendment (c), in line 5, leave out from beginning to end of line 18.

Amendment (e), in line 16, leave out from 'no' to 'the recommendation' in line 17 and insert

'order may be made under this Part in the terms of the draft order unless either—

(a) before the order is made—

(i) at least two years have passed since the recommendation was made, and

(ii) the procedure to be observed under this Part has been observed anew, or

(b) '.

Amendment (d), in line 18, at end add—

'(4D) Where a draft order has been the subject of a recommendation under subsection (4A) and no further proceedings have been taken in the same Session, a Minister may not table a like draft Order within a period of two years after the day before the draft order was laid before Parliament pursuant to section 12.'.

No. 55, in page 9, line 18 [Clause 16], after subsection (6) insert—

'(6A) However, a committee of either House charged with reporting on the revised draft order may, at any time after the revised draft order is laid under subsection (5) and before it is approved by that House under subsection (6), recommend under this subsection that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the revised draft order.

(6B) A recommendation under subsection (6A) may be made only if the committee considers that—

(a) the provision made by the revised draft order does not serve the purpose specified in section (Power to remove or reduce burdens)(2), (Power to promote regulatory principles)(2) or (Power to implement Law Commission recommendations)(2) (as the case may be);

(b) any relevant condition in section 3(2) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the revised draft order referred to in section 3(1); or

(c) the condition in section 3(4) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the revised draft order referred to in section 3(3).

(6C) Where a recommendation is made by a committee of either House under subsection (6A) in relation to a revised draft order, no proceedings may be taken in relation to the revised draft order in that House under subsection (6) unless the recommendation is, in the same Session, rejected by resolution of that House.'.

As Amendments to Hilary Armstrong's proposed Amendment (No. 55):—

Amendment (a), in line 1, leave out from 'with' to end of line 15 and insert

'responsibility for this matter may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.'.

Amendment (b), in line 6, leave out from beginning to end of line 15.

Amendment (c), in line 6, leave out from beginning to end of line 19.

Amendment (e), in line 17, leave out from 'no' to 'the recommendation' in line 17 and insert

'order may be made under this Part in the terms of the revised draft order unless either—

(a) before the order is made—

(i) at least two years have passed since the recommendation was made, and

(ii) the procedure to be observed under this Part has been observed anew, or

(b) '.

Amendment (d), in line 19, at end add—

'(6D) Where a draft order has been the subject of a recommendation under subsection (6A) and no further proceedings have been taken in the same Session, a Minister may not table a like draft Order within a period of two years after the day before the draft order was laid before Parliament pursuant to section 12.'.

Mr. Djanogly: This important group of amendments seeks to introduce similar changes to clauses 14, 15 and 16, which outline the procedure that would apply when an order is to be made under the negative resolution procedure, the affirmative resolution procedure or the super-affirmative resolution procedure. One of our long-held criticisms of the Bill is that it lacks adequate safeguards for the use of its fast-track order-making powers, which many people believe will abolish our constitutional longstops. The Bill has widely become known as the "abolition of Parliament Bill".

We supported the Government's amendments to part 1 of the Bill yesterday, following their stated intention that the Bill would deal only with deregulation. However, we made it clear that our overall support would depend on the introduction of further safeguards. The introduction of a procedural veto to the Bill, which would be exercised either by the Houses of Parliament or by Select Committees, was one of the primary mechanisms recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and me on Second Reading, as a means of introducing such safeguards.

For that reason, an amendment to clause 16 was tabled in Committee. It would have required an order to have been withdrawn or amended if an amendment to the order had been agreed by one or both of the Houses of Parliament or by the relevant Committees of either House. The amendment would have granted Parliament the power to insist on amendments to the order which, if not accepted by the Minister, would have to be withdrawn. The Minister would then have to start the process all over again.

The Conservatives were, admittedly, far from being the only ones calling for a parliamentary veto on the use of the procedures in the Bill. The Liberal Democrats have done the same, and I noted with interest the reports of the Regulatory Reform and Public Administration Committees, among whose recommendations was a call for an amendment to the Bill to provide scope for an effective veto.

Our support for the insertion of the procedural veto into the Bill meant that we welcomed the then Minister's announcement in Committee—I see him in his place today—that he would introduce a parliamentary veto on the use of the procedure. The Conservative party welcomes the Government's amendments on the statutory veto as a significant step in the right direction. It is accepted in most quarters that the Bill requires adequate safeguards so that it is not used in future as a tool for the Executive to abuse their power and discard Parliament. The amendments are meant to carry through the Government's pledge to build in a veto over an order for the relevant Committees of both Houses of Parliament. However, the amendments fall far short of introducing the robust and firm veto that we would expect to see inserted in such an important and constitutionally significant Bill.

Our concerns were heightened when we read the wording of the amendments. The Minister needs to explain exactly what the amendments entail. A Select Committee of either House may recommend that the relevant draft order should not be proceeded with. That recommendation, however, can be discarded if it is rejected by a resolution of the relevant House. Furthermore, when making such a recommendation, the Committee must have considered a range of factors, including those listed in clause 3. Our primary concern is that the conditions imposed on the relevant Committee, by which it is able to exercise such a veto, are excessive.

The primary difference between the Government's amendments and the amendment tabled by Conservative Members in Committee and now in new clause 5 is that the Government's proposals allow for the veto to be exercised only by a Select Committee, whereas our proposals allow for a veto by either the Committee or the Houses of Parliament. I note that the Procedure Committee, which recently produced an insightful report on the Bill, recommended that the power of veto should be exercised "outside the Committee as well as within it".

While the Government's amendments allow both Houses to become involved in the process, they do not contain an automatic right of veto. If either House is unhappy with an order, it cannot veto it until a Committee has acted. The Procedure Committee's report noted that there was no need for the Bill to include a power of veto exercised beyond the Committee. It recommended that the mechanism by which the House of Commons exercised the veto should rest on House of Commons procedure. Is the Government's failure to empower Parliament by including an automatic veto in the Bill a result of that recommendation? If so, what steps will be taken to amend the House's procedure to ensure that it possesses a veto and that the mechanics are fully in place? More urgently, why will the Government not accept that this is a matter of great concern to Opposition parties and other Members who have voiced concerns and deal with the matter now, setting out the balances and stating the powers in the Bill?

While the Opposition are concerned about the lack of a parliamentary veto under the Government's amendments, we are also concerned that a Committee could have its veto overridden by a resolution of the relevant House. According to the wording of the Government's amendments, the veto of a Select Committee, which the Cabinet Office proudly proclaimed in its press release on 4 May, is effectively nothing more than a recommendation. The difference between a veto and a recommendation is obvious and needs no further explanation. Were a Commons Committee to recommend that no further proceedings were to take place, is it not likely that the Government would simply use their majority in the House to overrule it? Would not that negate completely the introduction of the veto?

If the Government have their way on this set of provisions, how will Parliament be able to ensure that the more contentious issues are dealt with in the Lords, where the veto is not capable of being vetoed by majority party votes?

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): The Government deserve credit for listening to representations and giving ground in some other areas, but does my hon. Friend accept that in this area they have failed to meet the assurances given by the previous Minister, the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), to the Procedure Committee? Is he aware that on 7 February this year, the then Minister told the Procedure Committee:

"so our commitment is very clear, that we will not seek to do anything which is highly controversial. The Select Committee will make a judgment on that and the Select Committee can veto any recommendation from a minister."

The veto now proposed falls far short of that commitment.

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Part of the problem is that the Government have been consistently late in responding to comments made in Committees and in producing draft clauses for review. We have been treating Report, to some extent, like Second Reading because we have not seen the clauses to comment on them.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend is making sound points in criticising the adequacy of the veto offered. Will he reflect on whether a veto is totally reassuring? As my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) just pointed out, the former Minister repeatedly gave assurances in various forums that nothing that was controversial would be taken through in this way. I take that to mean that a substantial number of Members of the House saying that a measure should be subject to the parliamentary process should be adequate to stop the order making procedure being used. If all that is offered can simply be overridden by the working majority of the Government of the day, very controversial measures could be taken through using this simple, scarcely parliamentary procedure. Just a bare majority of Members of the House of Commons would make sure that an unsuitable process was used to override a significant section of public and parliamentary opinion.

Mr. Djanogly: My right hon. and learned Friend makes an important point. Were the matter concerned to be dealt with in the Lords, where the veto is more likely to be effective, I can imagine Ministers moaning and groaning that unelected Members of the House of Lords should not concern themselves with administrative or deregulatory issues. As a result, we could be caught in a cleft stick.

Mr. Heath: Actually, what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said was entirely in line with the new clause that we shall discuss in this group, which my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) and I tabled and which I believe the hon. Gentleman has set his mind against. It is no good his saying that his right hon. and learned Friend has made an important point if he disagrees with the fundamentals of it when it comes to a vote.

Mr. Djanogly: I will come on to the hon. Gentleman's new clause, which has its problems, although, as he will hear, I believe that it merits further discussion.

We believe that the best course of action is to follow through the spirit of Government amendment No. 46. However, that amendment needs improvement to allow the veto to be exercised by either of the Houses or by Committees. I shall now deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) about new clause 14, as I know that he wants me to address it.

The Liberal Democrats' new clause 14 seeks to grant the House a statutory veto over orders introduced by virtue of this Bill. It suggest a novel alternative to relying on the recommendations of a Select Committee, already burdened and restricted in its freedom of action by the factors, as set out in the Government amendments, that must be considered when rejecting a draft order. That alternative is that a parliamentary veto may be exercised by a quorum of at least 10 per cent. of the House. The new clause also contains a safeguard of its own, in that those exercising their veto must encompass more than a single parliamentary party. That would prevent a single political group from rejecting the Government's measures on purely partisan grounds. It has been suggested that an order introduced under the Bill, which, if we are to believe the Government's words, would relate only to deregulation and Law Commission proposals, should be stalled by a parliamentary veto only if it is controversial. If that is the case, the order should be presented to Parliament in the form of primary legislation.

I agree that new clause 14 would in practice mean that only controversial measures would be vetoed, and I understand the spirit of it. However, it goes too far by setting a precedent in other areas of procedure. Issues such as what should be a relevant percentage and entrenching minority rights would need a much wider review.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): The hon. Gentleman mentioned minorities. I think that the Liberal Democrats' new clause has its merits, in that the minority parties would be included. The hon. Gentleman is more than aware that we are not included on all Select Committees. In fact, we are on very few of them. That means that we would have no say in any veto. The Liberal Democrat proposal would allow us at least an opportunity to participate.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman has just demonstrated his ability to participate. I do not think anyone is saying that he cannot participate in the progress of legislation. We maintain, however, that establishing a veto has significant implications for the flexibility of the way in which the House works, and would require a full review.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The hon. Gentleman told the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) that he had demonstrated the ability of minority parties to exercise this right in the Chamber. The point is that the Government's procedures require them to exercise it in a Select Committee. We are trying to enable the whole House to influence what happens to procedure. Members of a Select Committee are, by their nature, select.

Mr. Djanogly: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I gave some time to his party's proposal because I think there could be some merit in it, but I also think that we need a full, much wider review than it proposes.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The difficulty is that we cannot reflect fully in the time before the Bill leaves the House of Commons. I find myself in the slightly embarrassing position of supporting what the Liberal Democrats have said. At a meeting, the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) and I urged that view on the then Minister, and I think that it has considerable merit.

Of course I accept that we cannot normally allow minority vetoes on the processes of the House or on ordinary parliamentary procedure, but yesterday I accepted new clause 19—reluctantly, as did my hon. Friend—as a step in the right direction. I was prepared to allow some flexibility in abandoning parliamentary procedure for non-controversial measures. Surely, though, if 65 Members say that a measure merits being subject to the full parliamentary process, it is not a non-controversial deregulatory measure. If we were in office, I would take the view that even if the 65 were shell-backed left-wing members of the Labour party with a stray Welsh Nationalist added, they would be entitled to the full parliamentary process, and to be allowed to veto a short-cutting of the whole parliamentary procedure, which we are all prepared to contemplate only in the case of genuinely non-controversial deregulatory measures.

Mr. Djanogly: I hear what my right hon. and learned Friend says. It is an interesting debate. According to company law, 10 per cent. of members can call an annual general meeting but cannot scrap a resolution. The percentage figure would need to be reviewed carefully in the context of the way in which the House works. Let us not forget that these proposals were presented to the House a matter of days ago. I respectfully suggest that to say that there should have been or could have been adequate time is not realistic, but, as I said to Liberal Democrat Members, I do not discount it as an argument, and it may be followed up in the other place.

Andrew Miller: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman in his difficulties with the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). I am sure he would accept that all motions before the House tabled by Back Benchers must have equal status. According to his logic, the House would be forced to debate any early-day motion that attracted more than 65 signatures. That would tie down parliamentary time to an impossible degree.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, if only in saying—as I think I have been saying—that a good many of the issues will need to be examined in the round. It is not just a question of slapping down a clause and saying "Isn't that a great idea? Let us put it into legislation." The Minister might even agree with me about that.

David Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Djanogly: I will give way one last time.

David Howarth: The problem that new clause 14 at least attempts to solve is precisely the question of what counts as controversial for the purpose of a choice between the procedure proposed by the Bill and ordinary legislation. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has read the report of the Committee proceedings. During those proceedings, his hon. Friend the. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) suggested that if one Member objected, the matter would be controversial and should be treated as a Bill.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman has made the same point again. He has heard what I have had to say. I shall move on now, but I think the Minister has received the message that Members would like to hear his views.

Mr. Chope: Does my hon. Friend now accept that there may well be scope for common ground between all Opposition Members, so that when the Bill goes to the other place an amendment along these lines will be able to command common support among Liberal Democrats and Conservatives, and receive applause when it returns to the House of Commons?

Mr. Djanogly: I think that the matter should be seen in a wider context, and in that context I cannot answer my hon. Friend's question. What I can say is that our party will discuss it with our noble Friends.

Another of our concerns is that the amendments severely restrict the period during which the Committee's veto can be exercised. Amendments Nos. 46 and 50 allow for the exercise of the veto in the negative and affirmative resolution procedure respectively only after a 30-day period commencing with the day on which the draft order is laid before Parliament. That means that the period during which the veto may be exercised is limited to just 10 days.

While I understand the time limit, I wonder on reflection whether there is really a need to prevent a Committee from exercising its veto in the first 30 days following the laying of a draft order before Parliament. Perhaps the Minister could explain. In any event, we look forward to hearing the debate on the issue, particularly the debate on amendment (a), which was tabled by members of the Procedure Committee.

Amendments Nos. 54 and 55 allow for the veto to be exercised under the super-affirmative procedure only during the period between the moment when the Minister lays a statement before Parliament detailing representations made on the draft order and the moment at which the order is voted on in both Houses and therefore approved. It is unclear how long the gap between the two events is estimated to be. Is it not feasible that they could occur within a matter of days of each other?

We are also concerned about the conditions that must be met for a recommendation from a Committee to be valid. They appear onerous, and may provide the Government with a simple excuse to reject a Committee's recommendation rather than resorting to an attempt to defeat the recommendation in the House.

The factors listed in clause 3 that a Minister must take into account when introducing an order are essential. They provide a valuable safeguard, one of the few originally contained in the Bill before widespread criticisms forced the Government to back down. For that reason it is right that the Minister must consider those factors, but is it necessary for a parliamentary Committee—consisting, I am sure, of competent and respected parliamentarians—to have to take account of the same factors and more?

The changes to the Bill announced recently by the Cabinet Office are vital from a constitutional viewpoint. They will help to prevent a Government from abusing the Bill and from being able to amend any legislation on the statute book, but imposing conditions on a Committee of Parliament that is carrying out its function of holding the Executive to account and preventing abuses of power is surely unnecessary and over-restrictive. Do the Government not consider a parliamentary Committee sufficiently responsible to make a wise enough decision on a draft order introduced under the Bill? For that reason we tabled amendment (b) to the Government's amendments Nos. 50, 54 and 55, calling for the removal of subsections (2B), (4B) and (6B). We believe that such changes would create the robust and flexible veto that so many constitutional experts believe is vital to ensuring that the Executive do not abuse the power conferred on them by the Bill.

Our concerns about the Government amendments appear to be shared by the Procedure Committee. I note that it has also tabled amendments to all the Government's amendments relating to the statutory veto, calling for the omission from amendment No. 46 of proposed new subsections (2B) and (2C) and the corresponding subsections in amendments Nos. 50, 54 and 55. They would allow a Committee of either House to recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order. There would be no factors to consider and the onerous conditions imposed on the Committee by the Government amendments would cease to exist.

I shall now discuss our further amendments to the Government amendments, which would prevent a Minister from tabling a draft order for a period of two years if the same or similar order had been vetoed by the relevant Select Committee. A two-year moratorium has been imposed on altering the regulatory reform order, but no such standstill period is contained in the proposals. I noted with interest that such a moratorium was also recommended in the Regulatory Reform Committee's report. It was aimed at preventing a Minister who has just had an order vetoed from laying a similar order before Parliament.

In recent years, we have seen a growing culture in which the Executive ignore the will of Parliament or, should I say, the people. Certainly, we see that happening in the European Union with underhand plans, now being implemented, to bring in by stealth elements of the failed constitution. In the UK, we see it in the Government bringing in their regionalisation plans—whether it be through primary care trust mergers, about which we heard earlier today, or in respect of the police—despite losing heavily in the north-east referendum. Our amendments are aimed at stopping that move towards legislation by stealth and regurgitation of failed plans.

An important point about the statutory veto concerns the make-up of the Committee of either House charged with reporting on the draft order. It is unclear in the Bill what type of Committee it should be. Is there to be a permanent Committee, charged with reviewing all orders issued under the Bill? If so, I draw the Minister's attention to the Procedure Committee's conclusion that parliamentary scrutiny of draft orders should not necessarily be in the hands of a single Committee responsible for all orders, as in the Bill, but be discharged by whatever Committee has the relevant subject expertise, including the departmental Select Committee. Will the Minister clarify which Committees the Government envisage undertaking those crucial roles?

The Conservative party believes that the exercise of this veto, which was a central plank in the Government's effort to placate the fears of opponents of the Bill and was recommended by both the Public Administration Committee and the Regulatory Reform Committee, should be far more flexible than is envisaged in the amendment. The opinion of a Select Committee charged with reporting on a draft order laid before Parliament under the Bill should carry more force. There should be a less restrictive time period for the exercise of the Committee's recommendation, and fewer conditions should be imposed on the exercise of that recommendation.

Andrew Miller: I think this is the first time, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you have had to listen to our long and complicated debates on the Bill, so welcome to the Chair. To make it even more complicated, as the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) was speaking, my glasses fell apart, so I shall have to ask the Minister to hold my notes a little further away until my spare glasses arrive.

Both in partnership with my fellow members of the Select Committee and subsequently in exploring practical ways forward, I have carefully considered the matter of the veto. I was certainly left with the impression, as reinforced by the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, that we were not being offered a qualified veto and I have discussed with Ministers where that would leave us. I have expressed to my hon. Friends privately and put it on the record that I am uncomfortable with the Government's amendment, so I am anxious to listen to the views of the Chairman of the Procedure Committee when he moves his amendments, particularly when I have amended his amendments further in respect of the two-year rule.

What powers does the Minister envisage the Committee having? That is the most important issue. The Secretary of State said in a letter of 11 May—I referred to it yesterday and confused the hon. Member for Huntingdon—that the statutory veto was not "a blanket veto". There may be good technical reasons for that. I am not a lawyer, but am always prepared to listen to them. Often one has to listen to them at length; I do not want to disparage the profession of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), but he might be happier with a bigger Bill.

I am more interested in the practical ways of how the House deals with its business. That issue was raised by the Liberal Democrat MP, Brian Cotter, in 2001. In the Second Reading debate on the Regulatory Reform Bill 2001, Brian Cotter, then the Liberal Democrat Member for Weston-super-Mare, asked the then Minister, the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer), to explain what he meant about a ministerial undertaking. The undertaking given has proved to be mighty effective; only 27 orders were dealt with through the process in the last Parliament. The reason is probably that a ministerial undertaking given to the House is an absolute one.

If the Parliamentary Private Secretary would like to pick up my glasses from over there—I have just seen them through the corner of my eye—I would be extremely grateful, especially as the next part of my speech is written in micro-dot. What a wonderful service we get here. That's better, I can read my notes now. The ministerial undertaking given is, I think, a very powerful vehicle. I would like to establish clearly and unambiguously with the Minister whether he is prepared today to restate that ministerial undertaking. I cite what the then Minister said when he gave it:

> "First, I am happy to confirm that the order-making power will not be used for large and controversial measures"— we have already debated that.

> "Secondly, the Government would not proceed with an order against the Committee's wishes."—[Official Report, 19 March 2001; Vol. 365, c. 117.]

No qualifications there; it was said clearly that the Government would not proceed against the wishes of the Committee. If the Minister can today, irrespective of the partial statutory veto, give a similar undertaking, that would make a forceful point. As I look around at hon. Members in their places who have been or are Ministers, I know that they realise that such an undertaking would be of very considerable significance.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): A ministerial undertaking is no substitute for stating something in the Bill. Government amendment No. 46 includes no such statement; in fact, the restrictions on the use of the so-called veto are so great that it is difficult to imagine any circumstances in which it would be impossible for an order not to serve the purposes specified.

Andrew Miller: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but I am talking about practical politics; about a Committee's ability to say to a Minister without fear of judicial review that it is not prepared to let them continue along a particular course. That has proved an effective mechanism; that said, I would prefer to adopt an approach in keeping with the views of the Chairman of the Procedure Committee. The key is to ensure that this House has a practical means of stopping in their tracks a Minister who is going too far.

Mr. Heath: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman and I know that his intention is good, but the point is that Government's extraordinary proposal is to impose a statutory bar on what a Select Committee of this House can do. The hon. Gentleman is asking the Minister to assert that he will not use two thirds of the provision, which seems absurd. The only way that the Minister could make that binding is to be the only Minister involved with it, and to stay in office for ever, which is unlikely. If he has no intention of using the provision, why on earth include it in the Bill?

Andrew Miller: Given the Minister's experience over the past 24 hours, he probably wants to move on rapidly, like his predecessor, despite his sterling work. A ministerial undertaking is understood by this House to be binding on the Government. [Interruption.] Does the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe want to intervene?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My understanding of ministerial undertakings is that they are regarded as binding only on the Government of whom the Minister in question is a member. Leaving aside the history of ministerial undertakings not being adhered to by some Governments—and although I am sure that, if we took office, we would be impeccably deregulatory and simultaneously sensitive to the procedures of the House—the fact is that many undertakings given by the present Government would not be regarded as binding on successor Governments. I envisage that in 10 years' time, ministerial undertakings will be regarded as somewhat irrelevant. Indeed, that is why we did not accept assurances—given constantly by the previous Minister in response to complaints—that the original Bill would not be used in the way that it plainly allowed for if someone stuck to the law.

Andrew Miller: I have some sympathy with that point, but I am simply trying to find a practical way forward. We have yet to hear the Minister's views on this issue, but I am sure that the House will agree that the restating of the undertaking to which I have referred would be more than a nuance and would shift the ground, albeit slightly.

Sir Robert Smith: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is trying to come from, but under the previous regime, a Committee could communicate its concern and the Minister could then invoke his undertaking not to go against its wishes. How would the ministerial undertaking work under the terms of this new provision, which would constrain a Committee in expressing its reservation?

Andrew Miller: I know where I am coming from—it is where I am going to that sometimes proves a little difficult. In practice, I would expect a Committee of this House to make use of the potential veto at any stage up to the point at which the order in question is issued; I would not want to insist that it be used only when the draft order is published.

Let us consider the following example. An innocent-looking draft order affecting London museums met with the approval of the original consultees and, at first glance, of my predecessor Committee. But when it went out for broader public consultation, a legitimate authority expressed reservations and demonstrated to the Minister in question that an error had been made and that it was not appropriate. So one needs the power to exercise the veto at any stage, with or without statutory restrictions. Such a view is based on the undertaking given by the then Minister on Second Reading of the 2001 Act.

Mr. Greg Knight: Surely the point is this: we were given a ministerial undertaking on 7 February and what we need now is not a second one, but the delivery of the first. That can be done today if the Minister accepts the Procedure Committee's amendments.

Andrew Miller: As I said earlier, I have some sympathy with the views of the authors of those amendments, which provide a more clinical way of dealing with this issue. However, it seemed to me appropriate at least to explore this idea and to invite comments from the Minister, in order to help inform our proceedings. I understand where the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) is coming from, but I have yet to hear the Minister explain why the veto was drafted in this way, rather than according to the right hon. Gentleman's understanding, which is based on evidence given to his Committee.

I turn to the amendments standing in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) relating to the two-year rule. Essentially, they are probing amendments that seek to discover what will happen when a Minister is hell-bent on introducing an order, despite opposition from a Committee of the House. Clause 16, which deals with the super-affirmative resolution procedure, clearly sets out the reporting procedure. There are mechanisms that enable Ministers to tweak and amend an order in the light of discussions with Committees of both Houses, and with public bodies and individuals. So what starts as a draft order is not necessarily the final text. It may be amended or qualified in writing, or the body or organisation for which it is promulgated may make appropriate assurances. Yesterday, I gave the example of the assurance given to both Houses by the chairman of the Forestry Commission that satisfied the concerns expressed by my Committee.

Those possibilities are available in the tweaking process, but what happens if the Minister says that he will keep coming back even though the Committee does not like what he says? First, the parliamentary business managers would not be terribly enamoured of that and the Minister would not survive for long without being ridiculed for trying to repeat the same mistake over and over again—

6.30 pm

Mr. Heath: He would get promoted.

Andrew Miller: The hon. Gentleman must not tempt me. The alternative to that is that practical politics might stop a proposal returning to the House within the lifetime of a Parliament.

These are probing amendments, designed to elicit an explanation from the Government of when it would be sensible, in the lifetime of a Parliament, for a Minister to bring back to the House an order that a Select Committee had decided was not suitable for regulatory reform. Under what circumstances would the Minister consider that appropriate?

I am trying to break these complex legal issues into simple and practical procedures that would allow hon. Members to do their job and examine the work of the Executive in an effective manner. The work of the Regulatory Reform Committee would be strengthened if Conservative Members bothered to turn up, as I noted previously to the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), but that is a matter for him to deal with.

An effective mechanism is in place, but we are trying to make it stronger so that it can deal with the enhanced powers set out in the Bill. I hope that my comments will inform that debate, and I look forward to the response from my hon. Friend the Minister. That, in turn, will help the House to determine the best way forward.

Mr. Heath: I am intrigued by the notion expounded by the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) that ridiculing Ministers causes them to be sacked. In my experience, they get promoted or retain their salaries when their jobs are taken away. However, he clearly knows more about that than me.

We are dealing with one of the three most important elements in the Bill. Yesterday, I set out the three ways to secure some safety with the proposals. I said that that could be done by prescription of what could be dealt with by the Bill, by proscription of what could not be so dealt with, and by protection—that is, using the safeguards available to the House to influence the use of procedure.

This group of amendments is entitled "Parliamentary veto", but that is an unfortunate misnomer. A better alternative might be "Parliamentary caveat", as we are certainly not talking about Parliament vetoing what the Government propose. We have heard a great deal about the value of ministerial assurances and a Select Committee of the House was assured, right at the start of our consideration of the Bill, that there would be a Select Committee veto on proposals. The former Minister, who is now Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, originally thought that that mechanism was already in the Bill. It was gently pointed out to him that that was not the case, but he seemed to retain that misapprehension even as the Committee stage began. Eventually, he promised that it would be brought in later.

The tenor of the Government's response to the quite proper criticism of the Bill voiced by hon. Members of all parties has been that the Select Committee structure would have primacy in the procedural arrangements. It therefore bodes very badly for the exercise of the powers in the Bill that Ministers are not prepared, even now, to accept the recommendations of the Procedure Committee or of the Regulatory Reform Committee. The members of those Committees have great knowledge of these matters, but their proposals were not adopted by Ministers when they put forward their amendments.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be a fine thing to trust our Select Committees with the responsibility that he describes? If Ministers are not prepared to do that, they should say so. They gave the impression early on that they were prepared to trust the Select Committee with the responsibility, so can he understand why they will not do so now?

Mr. Heath: I do not understand anything about the Government's approach to the Bill. They have been dragged, kicking and screaming, to the realisation that they could not get through their entirely preposterous original proposals. They are in full retreat, making concession after concession, but even now they do not seem to understand the basic principles that underlie the many criticisms levelled at the Bill from many quarters, and so are unable to respond to them adequately.

The Government do not propose a Select Committee veto on procedure. It is transparently obvious that the most that Select Committees can do is to make a recommendation in that respect. I emphasise that we are not talking about a veto on an order itself, as Ministers could always use an alternative procedure to bring forward an order if the original procedure were rejected. They could use for that purpose the primary legislation that in normal circumstances would be the proper vehicle for introducing an order and, in turn, that would mean that an order would be properly scrutinised by this House and the other place.

That alternative was always open to Ministers, but the idea was to institute a fast-track procedure that would avoid that level of scrutiny before an order went into a Statutory Instrument Committee. No controversial measure was to have been put through the fast-track procedure, but the proposal under consideration would allow a Select Committee to consider an order only under a very constricted time scale. The result would be that that Committee would not be able to consider an order for too long, or to listen too carefully to the voices from outside the House. The few hon. Members serving on the Select Committee concerned would be able to make a recommendation, but that could be overruled by an order of the House.

In those circumstances, what would the motion put before the House contain? Would it allow a proper debate and give people an opportunity to express their concerns and say why they did not consider the fast-track procedure appropriate? Of course it would not. The matter would be dealt with at the end of the day in a business motion requiring a negative or an affirmative resolution of the House, and if anyone had the temerity to say no it would be pushed through on a deferred Division on a Wednesday afternoon. I would bet my life that the Government would have their way because no one would know about any of the arguments why they should not.

What considerations can a Select Committee make in even making such a recommendation? Can it follow its instincts? Can it listen to the advice that it was given? No, it cannot. The proposals from the Minister lay down the limited range of criteria that the Committee can use in coming to a conclusion. It is improper to constrain a Select Committee's considerations in that way. I know of no circumstances in which Ministers have tried by statutory means to restrict the activities of a Select Committee of the House.

Andrew Miller: That is why I wanted to explore whether it would be better to address the problem through a different route. It is a real issue and we have to deal with it, but I want to find the best solution.

Mr. Heath: I understand that the hon. Gentleman is trying to reach the right outcome, but I do not share his optimism that an assurance from Ministers on the Treasury Bench that they will not apply what is clearly laid out in statutory form in their proposals would have any value whatever. The Select Committee would be very constrained in the criteria that it could use to determine whether the procedure was right. It is transparently obvious that if a Minister did not like the result of the Select Committee's considerations, he would overrule it in the House. There is nothing in the provisions to stop a Minister behaving in that way. Even if the excellent new Minister on the Treasury Bench was absolutely determined that he would not use the provisions in that way, I do not believe that the writ of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Cabinet Office—or is it to the Duchy of Lancaster, I am not sure of the exact title?—would run to the Home Secretary or to the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): The hon. Gentleman underestimates my hon. Friend on the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Heath: I may be underestimating the Minister, but I have seen dodgy procedure from past Home Secretaries and I do not believe that a Home Secretary would listen to a junior Minister in the Cabinet Office. No assurances from the Treasury Bench will hold water.

For that reason, if the Government press ahead with the proposals in their amendments Nos. 46, 50, 54 and 55, it is essential that we amend them today to remove those appalling restrictions on the latitude allowed to Select Committees in undertaking their work, both in terms of time and the criteria they must use to assess whether an instrument is appropriate for the fast-track procedure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I think that I am correct in saying that if a Select Committee was contemplating a recommendation that the process should not be used it would almost certainly be advised by its Clerk that it was not able to make such a recommendation unless it addressed the terms of the legislation. It would be open to the Committee to make a recommendation only if it could demonstrate that it was complying with the conditions put on it. If the Select Committee decided as a matter of parliamentary principle that the process was not appropriate it would receive professional advice from the Clerk that it was not in a position to make a recommendation on that basis.

Mr. Heath: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right. Such statutory constraints on the exercise of a Select Committee's discretion are unique, but it is clear that, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) said earlier, most, if not all, of the good reasons for assessing that an order was inappropriate for the accelerated procedure would be declared ultra vires. We would have the absurd prospect that a Select Committee decision was justiciable—reviewable—on the basis that it had not followed criteria set down in statute in reaching its decision. When has a Select Committee ever been bound by statute, and justiciable in the courts, in the exercise of its discretion? The suggestion is preposterous.

6.45 pm

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree—

Edward Miliband: Hon. Friend?

Mr. Heald: I think that the hon. Gentleman is in this case.

Does my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) agree that in the important example given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) yesterday about tax cuts being something that could be fast-tracked using the order-making power, a Select Committee would not be able to veto it because it would have to go through exactly the same hoops as the Minister? As we know, tax cuts are not covered by that process so it is not a real protection in the circumstances outlined by my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Heath: I have hon. Friends on both sides of the Chamber so I, too, shall call the hon. Gentleman my hon. Friend in this matter. He is right. Anything within the terms of the order, and that the Minister has correctly assessed as within the terms of the order, must be so in the view of the Select Committee because it has to apply the same criteria. Therefore, any political judgment on the essential question of what is controversial means nothing in the context of the provision. We were told at the start of the Bill's proceedings that it would not be used for anything controversial. Then, the Government elevated the threshold slightly and said that it would not be used for anything "highly" controversial. I hope that we have now gone back to "controversial".

Unless we make the necessary amendments, the whole measure will be meaningless. If the opportunity arises, I shall press hard my amendment (c) to Government amendment No. 46, because removing those constraints is crucial to the work of Select

[Mr. Heath]

Committees. Even if that were achieved, we would still have the problem, alluded to in a short debate between the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) and most of his hon. Friends on the Back Benches, who did not agree with him, about a genuine parliamentary veto.

A Select Committee has a Government majority. If the purpose of the safeguard is to ensure that something that is deeply controversial to a section of the House—whether on the Government Benches or elsewhere—is not put through a fast-track procedure, a simple majority in a Select Committee with a Government majority will not do the job, however assiduously the Committee may attempt to do its job. With the best will in the world, its members may not be aware of the local implications of an order put through by that process that might be deeply controversial. The procedure can be used not only for general public Acts, but for local Acts. The Regulatory Reform Committee or its successor might be completely unaware of a particular local Act, not because Members had not done their research properly, but because there was a burning political issue—we are, after all, politicians, which is why we are sent to this place—of which they were unaware because none of them was from that area.

Andrew Miller: If I might correct the hon. Gentleman, that is why we have a consultation process. That is why the order relating to London museums, to which I referred earlier, was dropped. The consultation process identified an error relating to a local matter, which would certainly not have been an issue in Burnley, the constituency of my predecessor as Chairman.

Mr. Heath: I understand the hard work that goes on in Select Committees to try to deal with such issues, but as we all know—certainly those of us with local authority backgrounds—often there will be no response to a consultation and the matter appears entirely benign, until it is implemented. Then everybody says, "Why didn't you ask us? Why didn't you consult us? Why didn't you allow our objections to be heard?" Of course there was the opportunity, but no one asked the right person at the right time about their problems.

I want to make it clear that we do not suggest the sort of process in new clause 14 from our partisan point of view. We deliberately set the threshold beyond what the Liberal Democrat party has in the House. I do not think that 10 per cent. is an unreasonable figure. If 10 per cent. of the House feel strongly about something, the voice of those hon. Members should be heard, because that subject is controversial by definition. If that 10 per cent. comprise at least two parties represented in the House, it is clear that no simple mechanism on behalf of one party for political advantage is involved.

I believe that if those circumstances apply, it is right that that should apply a brake to the procedure. Let us remember that it would not be a brake on the order. The order can still be translated into primary legislation and go through its normal course of action. It is not a question of a minority party preventing legislation; it is simply suggesting that the legislation must be scrutinised. There are Liberal Democrat Members, Conservative Members and Members from the minority parties who very clearly understand the merits of that case.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's view that the House should be able to challenge the view of a Select Committee, and most certainly that of an Executive with overweening power, but I am very concerned indeed about the second part of his proposal because there is a quaint and long-standing belief that Members of Parliament are individuals who speak for themselves and their constituents, based on an assessment of the problem. If he and the Liberal Democrats go down the road of suggesting that any measure in the House must have the support of more than one party, it is a very slippery path indeed.

Mr. Heath: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his observation. First, parties are established under Standing Orders—we understand what parties are—and secondly, it was a criticism when we first suggested such a proposal that to allow one party effectively to block a parliamentary procedure was inappropriate, because that should require a greater degree of consensus. That is precisely why we suggested the provision. I find it slightly odd that we now hear a quibble from the other direction, suggesting that such things should be in the hands of a single party, but perhaps that could be debated later. However, the proposal has considerable merit in terms of parliamentary procedure. Simply because we do not do it now is not a good enough reason to say that we should not do it in the future.

The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston made the point about early-day motions being discussed on the Floor of the House. There ought to be a mechanism for that, too, if enough hon. Members want to do so. When an early-day motion is signed by more than half the membership of the House, such as the one on the removal of the Post Office card account, I cannot believe that we as a House cannot insist that we should debate the subject—a majority of hon. Members from all parties very feel strongly about it—yet we do not have the mechanism to do so.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman think that we are in danger of having too many veto proposals in the Bill? The idea of the Select Committee veto—something that we have all pressed for throughout consideration the Bill—should be applauded and strengthened, and we should be pressing for that. However, I wonder about considering other proposals that relate to blocking minorities on the Floor of the House. That would set a major precedent because it could be argued that perhaps a blocking-minority approach should be adopted for every procedure. Surely, if we were to do that we would need a major inquiry and discussion between the parties about how we tackle our procedures on numbers. The next step after that would be to say that we have entrenched majorities for constitutional matters. It would then be a different kind of Parliament, and it may be a good one, but to make that change—which would have huge significance constitutionally—piecemeal would be the wrong thing to do.

Mr. Heath: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I simply do not agree with him. We need to set a precedent occasionally. We are discussing an entirely novel procedure, to which a brake needs to be applied, and we have suggested a good brake. That view is clearly shared by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who chairs the august body in the Conservative party that is working on exactly these matters. His opinions should carry some weight among Conservative Members.

We ought to send a signal today, which is why, given the opportunity, I will press new clause 14 to a Division this evening, and I will do so content in the knowledge that it would serve the interests of Back Benchers, minority parties and those who would not otherwise have the opportunity to make their voice heard—and who ought to be heard, either in a Select Committee or a Statutory Instrument Committee—at a later stage. My worry about leaving the issue to another place, as I think the hon. Member for Huntingdon intimated, is that Members of the House of Lords will be very cautious indeed about expressing an opinion, because it is quintessentially a House of Commons matter.

My worry is that they will simply not feel able to make the necessary intervention. That is why tonight's debate is so important—it may be our last opportunity to make it clear that the procedure that the Government propose will not do. If the Bill is passed today by a Government majority, I do not believe that it will come back to us—I wish it would, but my fear is that the other place will feel inhibited about intervening in House of Commons business for all the reasons that we know, and therefore it will not come back to us for reconsideration. Therefore, tonight is make-your-mind-up time about whether we accept the very flawed mechanism that the Government propose.

Mr. Greg Knight: I only want to correct what I think was a slip of the tongue. The hon. Gentleman said that he wanted to divide the House on new clause 42. I presume that he meant amendment No. 46.

Mr. Heath: I referred to new clause 14. I think that the right hon. Gentleman, who is the Chairman of Procedure Committee, misheard me, but I am grateful to him for intervening because it is important that the discussion of these procedures is not only intelligible but audible. So I repeat that I wish to seek a Division on new clause 14. We had very important debate yesterday. This is the important debate today, because if we get this wrong the procedure, albeit not quite so open-ended as before the Government amendments were accepted yesterday, will nevertheless be too open-ended for the comfort of any hon. Member.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): There is, of course, a slight gap between the way in which we talk about Parliament and how it operates, and perhaps we ought to confess to that, in the interests of people who listen to our debates and read the reports of them. That was caught quite nicely by the casual remark of my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), the Chairman of the Regulatory Reform Committee, when he said as an aside that the Conservative members of that Committee do not turn up. I do not say that to make a trivial party point of the kind that we are prone to make; I say it only because we are talking about the great powers that should live within our Select Committees and how important it is that their will should prevail, and we then go on to talk about the glories of Parliament itself. Yet that is suddenly pierced when we see the reality of how such things work.

It is rather amusing in a way to watch the Opposition parties failing to agree on what would be appropriate for Parliament to do in the circumstances—whether it is better that a Committee should decide, whether the whole House should decide, or whether a percentage of the House should decide, all of which ideas depend on different versions of what Parliament is and how it operates. However, it is quite a perverse argument to suggest that the House itself should not decide on a matter before it. That argument is being put, because the House is governed by parties and inbuilt majorities. That is true; it is how our system works—but it is odd to pick away at that system in one little segment without acknowledging the fact in our wider deliberations.

That is a curious proposition, because anyone looking at it from the outside would think it a rather sensible procedure for the whole House—the Commons bit of parliamentary sovereignty—to exercise its power, so that it can constitutionally trump whatever a part of the House might decide. That would seem the constitutionally proper arrangement. Indeed, that is precisely how we proceed in the entirety of our business. To acknowledge publicly that we do not want to proceed in that way, as is being argued, is to give the game away, in a sense, about how this place operates. If we are going to do that, we should at least follow the argument through and give the whole game away, and not pretend that we can just give a little bit of it away.

I take this area of the Bill and the amendments seriously. They are crucial. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) just said, we are talking about one of the most objectionable bits of the first incarnation of the Bill. It was right to say that it would become less objectionable, or unobjectionable, only if an effective veto were put into the Bill to provide a mechanism to enable us to say, "It is not appropriate to use this mechanism for this purpose," and for that view to prevail.

The question is: have the Government inserted such a mechanism? The answer is: partly. We have, perhaps, a qualified veto. We have a recommendation power. However, if it is a veto, it could be argued that we have a provision to veto the veto. Then we are back to the arguments that I have just described about how Parliament works. Parliament can collectively decide what to do—but we know that in reality, that can subvert the mechanism that we think we have established to do a job for us. As has been said, we are talking about a Committee that has a Government majority anyway, so why do the Government need the reassurance of a veto on the veto when they have inserted a procedure that, on the whole, is thought to be satisfactory?

There may be disagreements about the mechanisms being recommended, but what unites everybody who is contributing to this discussion is the proposition that we want a strong rather than a weak veto. We want an effective veto, rather than an ineffective one. We are entitled to look to the Government to provide assurances about what is going to happen in the days to come to deliver that effective veto, so that this whole area of concern about the Bill is comprehensively removed. That is my main point.

I have one further point on a matter that has been raised already—trying to specify the grounds on which the qualified veto can be exercised by a Committee. Government amendments Nos. 46, 50, 54 and 55 insert that qualified veto, but they also set out the only grounds that a Committee may properly take into account when deciding whether to exercise that veto. Including in the Bill in that way the grounds on which a Committee may make a decision is entirely new. Previously, that has always been a matter for Standing Orders.

There are two difficult alternatives: either the courts will have the power to review proceedings in Parliament, or the limitation is entirely ineffective because the courts would hold that power without an express provision overriding article 9 of the Bill of Rights. They have no power to examine a Committee's reasoning, because to do so would be to "impeach or question" proceedings in Parliament. It is constitutionally extremely peculiar to invite the courts to review judicially the validity of parliamentary decisions. That is why a number of the amendments—including one tabled by me—seek to remove those parts of the veto provision.

I hope that when he replies, the Minister will assure us that the concerns being expressed about the effectiveness of the veto will be addressed, and that he will reflect further and deliver a veto that will be strong rather than weak, and effective rather than ineffective. I hope that he will reconsider whether it is necessary, or indeed constitutionally desirable or possible, to specify the grounds on which a Committee of the House can exercise its power.

Mr. Greg Knight: I rise to speak about Government amendment No. 46 and amendment (a) to it, which is in my name and the names of other members of the Procedure Committee. Amendment (a) is a cross-party amendment, although I am aware that some members of the Committee see it as a probing amendment, while others feel very strongly about it. Government amendments Nos. 46, 50, 54 and 55 introduce the Committee veto that we have been discussing in respect of the orders under the Bill.

The Procedure Committee recommended that a veto should be added to the Bill, so I give the Government one cheer for delivering the veto. However, in introducing that veto they have only partly met their commitment to the Committee, because they have sought to define the grounds on which the veto can be exercised. I have serious concerns about that on two grounds. First, as has been said by the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), it raises the possibility that the courts might be encouraged to examine how a Committee reached a decision, and whether it did so properly. That would be clearly contrary to the accepted understanding of article 9 of the Bill of Rights, as the hon. Member for Cannock Chase said. It could draw the courts into areas that they have hitherto been at pains to avoid.

Secondly, and most importantly, the grounds themselves are narrowly defined and certainly do not live up to the Government's previous undertaking that no order would be proceeded with if the relevant Committee judged that it was an inappropriate use of the powers under the Bill—for example, because the matter was controversial. I refer Members to my Committee's first report of this Session—HC 894—and evidence pages 17 and 18. We received evidence from the Minister who was then at the Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), who gave at least three ministerial assurances on this matter—or perhaps I should say one ministerial assurance that was repeated three times.

The hon. Gentleman was unequivocal about the veto. In answer to questioning, he said:

"so our commitment is very clear, that we will not seek to do anything which is highly controversial. The Select Committee will make a judgment on that and the Select Committee can veto any recommendation from a minister."

During the same evidence session, he went on to say:

"Ultimately, the sanction that select committees have is, 'It doesn't feel right. You have overstepped what we anticipated and we are not willing to give our consent to this going forward either in the way you propose', so it should not be a negative, it should be an affirmative order or it should be super-affirmative, 'or it should not go ahead at all'."

Later, he returned to the scope of the veto and, referring to what the Committee could do, he said:

"so they can either move it up one, or move it up two in fact, so they can move it from negative to super-affirmative, or indeed they could just say, 'We don't think this is suitable at all for this committee', and we are back to the drawing board to seek an alternative way of implementing the order."

There was no mention of restrictions on the use of the veto, which are now before us.

My Committee's amendment, and others, would remove the definition of the grounds for the use of the veto, thus leaving open the possibility that an additional veto, which could be exercised outside a Committee, could be introduced by Standing Orders.

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Hilary Armstrong): It might help the House if I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the evidence that he is citing was given before the amendments to limit the powers with regard to the orders were tabled. The Government have been very careful to limit those powers in the manner for which the House asked through the Select Committees that examined the matter. They simply linked the veto to the new restricted powers. Part of the almost circular argument that we are having is that although we have agreed the limit on the powers, it is said that the powers are now so narrow that the veto must be widened. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman understands what the Government were trying to do. During this debate, yesterday's debate on narrowing the powers is being forgotten. The Government tried to link the veto to the new definition of the powers.

Mr. Knight: I am not sure that that is a valid point. The powers in the Bill may well have been narrowed, but that has been done only in line with what Ministers said the purpose of the Bill would be anyway. Ministers have introduced provisions that achieve what they told us, through assurances, that the Bill would be used for. I do not accept the point that the right hon. Lady is making.

We do not want to widen the veto, but we think that it should be exercised as was indicated by the former Minister when he gave evidence to the Procedure Committee: if a measure is controversial—although controversy is outwith the scope of the veto—a Committee should be able to veto it. That would not stop the Government getting their legislation through. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said, we are merely suggesting that we should be able to say to the Government that the fast-track procedure is not appropriate in a specific case, so the measure should be subject to greater scrutiny. With the greatest respect to the right hon. Lady, she did not make a valid point at all.

If the Government are not ratting on a promise, they are certainly guilty of backsliding on an unequivocal ministerial assurance given to a Select Committee of the House. I hope that we will be able to vote on amendment (a) to Government amendment No. 46. Quite simply, the House should not put up with this.

Alison Seabeck: As a member of both the Regulatory Reform Committee and the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, I am generally pleased by the progress that has been made. However, I still have concerns about this group of amendments, especially Government amendments Nos. 46, 50, 54 and 55. Those concerns have been voiced with greater knowledge and expertise than mine by my hon. Friends the Members for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) and for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright).

Although the Regulatory Reform Committee's special report, which has been much quoted, has, it appears, provided the basis for many of the revisions that have been made to the Bill, no further amendment has been made to one or two aspects. However, there is still a case for both this House and another place to consider those aspects. That is why I have put my name to several amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston.

In my view, and in that of the Regulatory Reform Committee and the Public Administration Committee, it is preferable that after an order has been laid, no draft order to the same effect, or any which, although it has been reworded or modified, would have the same effect, should be laid within two years. The veto as it stands does not bring with it the two-year moratorium that the Regulatory Reform Committee felt was appropriate as a matter of course. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will again consider proposing further changes, which could be brought forward in another place, to introduce such a measure.

The Regulatory Reform Committee felt that the demand for a two-year breathing space did not expect more from Ministers than at present, as they already voluntarily respect that rule. However, in the interests of our peace of mind, and with regard to possible abuse by future Governments and Ministers who are not so well disposed or responsible as the present incumbents, this matter demands further ministerial consideration.

Unless a Committee's veto was overturned by the House, the Committee would have significant powers—although, as hon. Members have said, its precise role is not exactly clear. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) raised concerns too, so I hope that the Minister will clarify the time scale in which the veto must be exercised, because it is 10 days in the case of Government amendment No. 54, but a less specific period in the case of Government amendment No. 55.

There appears to be no scope for a formal veto if the real problem is an order being categorised as controversial or inappropriate. Members of the Standing Committee will recall that we could not get a clear definition of those terms, despite the then Minister's best efforts to provide reassurance. The Bill is thus narrower than the informal undertaking that has been respected since the introduction of the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. Will the Minister confirm whether such an undertaking remains on offer this time? If not, will he consider including it more formally in the Bill?

The Minister's predecessor said to the Public Administration Committee:

"to get the veto provision correct will take a great deal of work and thorough consideration".

There has been a great deal of thorough consideration, but we may still have work to do to ensure that the Bill meets the concerns raised in the House today. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not rule out amendments that would insert the two-year restriction, following the gentle and friendly probing of Labour Members.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I almost stopped trying to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, because I agreed with everything said by my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) when he moved new clause 5 and everything said by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) and the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). On these questions of parliamentary procedure, we are Members who are usually brought together across the Floor in such discussions. I speak only to underline the importance of the points that are being made for the benefit of those in another place. The general understanding outside is that the Government have made a substantial retreat, and it might be felt that the worst problems have somehow been solved and that there is not a great deal left to do. Unless the Minister makes an extremely generous response to the debate, I hope that Members of another place will examine seriously whether we are adequately reassured by what has been done.

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

I regard the Bill as dangerous because we are talking about circumventing the ordinary parliamentary processes of considered debate and judgment and using instead a fast-track procedure that might have broad application. I am prepared to take the risk of passing such a Bill because of my enthusiasm for deregulation. I have no reason to doubt the bona fides of either Minister who has handled the Bill in detail because both genuinely endeavoured to have as wide a Bill as possible so that they can deliver deregulatory measures. I look forward to reading the reports and finding out what has been delivered. I think that the Minister will be contending with the culture of Westminster and Whitehall, but I hope that his good intentions will produce something worth while.

We need the strictest safeguards when introducing a procedure that can further reduce the use of the proper parliamentary process for potentially difficult subjects. As my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire said, we should hold the Government precisely to the undertakings that the former Minister gave. I thus echo everything that has been said about the Select Committee having the right to exercise a veto at its own discretion, bearing in mind the concern that we have all expressed that the procedure should not be used to circumvent parliamentary procedure when a significant body of interest is entitled to be heard.

I have to say—this is about the only note of dissent that has arisen between any two Members who have spoken, because we have not yet heard the ministerial reply—that I have never been completely reassured by the Select Committee veto. Select Committees have an in-built Government majority. A year or two ago, the House was given the opportunity to reconsider the way in which Select Committees are appointed because of concerns that the powers of ministerial and Whips Office patronage were being brought to play in appointments to Select Committees. I do not want to discuss whether that is still true, but the danger is only too obvious—and it might recur. At present, there is a great deal of patronage. We are lucky that such good Chairmen as the ones who have spoken have emerged from the process. Nevertheless, there is an in-built Government majority.

The undertakings that were given from the outset were outlined in a precise quotation from my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire. We were reassured that the full parliamentary process would be used for any controversial procedure. In my opinion, that means giving an adequately large minority the opportunity to have their views heard and debated, and to insist that an important change goes through the correct process.

Mr. Walker: Is my right hon. and learned Friend concerned that the Government could lean on the more ambitious and younger members of the Select Committee to ensure that they come round to the Government's way of thinking, although that would go against the rules of the House?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member for Cannock Chase gave some candid views on how the House works in reality. We should be careful about too much candour, but I have not the slightest doubt that Governments of all complexions use the process to which my hon. Friend refers if a Select Committee looks like it will be too difficult. There is, of course, a political process behind that, which we all realise has to be borne in mind.

I reiterate my belief that if a substantial body of opinion in the House wishes to insist on the full procedure, it should have the opportunity of doing so. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon for putting him in a slight difficulty, but I have no way of getting out of this because I shared a platform with the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) from which we advocated such an idea. In the end, that is the only satisfactory reassurance we can have.

The Liberals have been quite generous in putting the limits they propose beyond their reach as a single party. I am not sure why one of the three major parties of the House should be prevented from having a full parliamentary procedure if it so wishes, but I agree with my Front-Bench colleagues that that would involve much wider considerations, including the whole question of who determines what we debate on the Floor of the House and how we do it. That needs to be addressed.

I continue to hold the view that the one thing that will be completely beyond the control of the Government is stopping 10 per cent. of the Members of the House indicating, in some formal fashion, that they believe that the full process should go ahead. If we can get 10 per cent. to insist on that, it means that there is some interest, with which I probably profoundly disagree, that is entitled to have the full parliamentary process before the legislative machinery is changed.

My hon. Friends are worried about precedent. One of the most common arguments used by the civil service and others against deregulation is the precedent that might be created if we reopen something. Precedent has to be approached with caution. Let me make it clear: I do not think that the proposal establishes any precedent for allowing a minority to block legislation that has gone through the legislative process. It sticks in our craw when we have lost a measure by one vote, but one vote is sufficient in this place for the majority to overrule the minority. However, we must go through a process before that conclusion can be reached. I do not see precedent being created because of the unique nature of the Bill. We are talking about altering primary legislation by a process that cuts out all the ordinary legislative process precisely because of the need for speed and to avoid delay, and because we are so keen on deregulation.

Dr. Tony Wright: Was not the right hon. and learned Gentleman's reference to the political factors the key consideration? Surely if the relevant Select Committee, with, as we keep saying, a Government majority, recommended that it was not appropriate to use the order-making power for the purpose proposed, and if the Government nevertheless sought to overturn that by using their majority to get a resolution of the House, there would be political consequences and it would be decided politically, which is how we decide everything in this place.

Mr. Clarke: That is why the constraint on the Select Committee to make that recommendation has to be removed. If the Select Committee makes a recommendation exercising a discretion and a political judgment that the process is unsuitable, I accept that it would be a bold Government indeed who went ahead with the change, although the point made was valid: we are not talking about the Government having to expose themselves to a full debate on the Floor of the House or some particular process to get their resolution through. We have now reached a stage at which half the time votes on orders and procedures have been reduced to a ritual part of the process of the House. If we are talking about the reality, the change would probably be decided by a deferred Decision on Wednesday, as I think the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said. If we are being indiscreetly candid, probably a very high proportion of the Members of Parliament ticking the piece of paper would not bother to inquire closely exactly what subject they were voting on. It is too trivial a procedure to override such a change.

I do not accept that the small body of Members who have the privilege of being on the Select Committee should be our only protection. A substantial body of the membership is enough.

Hilary Armstrong rose—

Mr. Clarke: I welcome the Minister to her new task. She is doing her best, with all these concessions, to sort out a rather miserable process that she inherited. I acknowledge all that. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire precisely and brilliantly responded to her main point. The undertakings were given by a Minister who said that the Bill would be used for only narrow purposes. I shall not go back to yesterday's debate, but I do not believe that the Bill as it stands has narrowed the scope of the powers to the scope described by the former Minister. It allows for far more than ordinary deregulation. That must be looked at again.

I hope lots of the orders go through. I hope the Government make liberal use of their new process. I undertake not to vote in deferred Divisions for trivial reasons to block deregulatory measures and upset the Government's timetable, or to cause difficulty. However, I want the reassurance that if a big body of opinion wants something debated, we will all be obliged to debate it and subject it to the full parliamentary process.

Hilary Armstrong: I want to make a point that I was never allowed to make in my previous incumbency, but none the less learned. The official Opposition can bring matters to the Floor of the House. When they chose to do so, the usual channels agreed with them, and such things were debated on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Clarke: I am being tempted to go into much wider issues on Supply days. That relates only to the Front Bench. There are occasions when Back Benchers feel frustrated that the leaders of their party do not wish to bring to the Floor of the House things that they want to debate. I do not often feel the frustration that a left-wing member of the Labour party must sometimes feel about the priorities given to business by his Front Bench, but there were times during the Iraq war when I was slightly impatient about the opportunities we had, the timing of the debates and the form of the motion proposed through the usual channels to be debated on the Floor of the House. On deregulatory matters to do with forestry and the licensing of vendors of game, one might often find that the two Front Benches and the usual channels do not have the monopoly of the views of every hon. Member about what the proper procedure should be.

I do not understand why Ministers are being so cautious. I have not doubted their good will because when I debated this matter with the previous Minister I believed him, and when I listen to these Ministers I believe them when they say that they have no intention of undermining Parliament and they intend to deregulate only on non-controversial measures. They give us every assurance that it has never crossed their minds to introduce politically controversial measures that might upset a significant minority or to avoid proper debate by taking it through their proposed process. I still cannot understand why the Government will not include that in the Bill, as they would bind all their successors—and not just themselves—if they did so. They are receiving advice from someone in the Department who does not share their deregulatory enthusiasm or who has a sneaking hope that one day a Government will get stuff through Parliament quicker and with less inconvenience. Why do the Government keep tabling late and mealy-mouthed amendments that do not live up to their undertakings? My praise for their deregulatory intentions would be followed by praise for their sensitivities to sentiments in the House if they tabled amendments—alternatively they could accept the amendments tabled by the Conservative spokesmen and by the Liberal Democrats—and include in the Bill something that they have been telling us since they first introduced it. I do not understand their reluctance to do so.

7.30 pm

David Howarth: I agree with every word that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said, and I do not intend to add to his contribution. I shall, however, make a few points that have not been made in our debate.

Our debate has focused on two amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that I am happy to support. Amendment (c) to Government amendment No. 46 removes from the Government's so-called veto—it is not, in fact, a veto—the requirement on the Committee to consider various things under clauses 2 and 3. New clause 14 attempts to provide a genuine parliamentary veto. I wish to make only one point about amendment (c). Yesterday, the Government were keen to tell us that their judicial review of ministerial discretion did not require the insertion of the word, "reasonably", in the Bill. That creates a problem, as what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. The word, "reasonably", does not appear in Government amendment No. 46, but "considers" does. That leaves scope for judicial review, as long as the problem of the Bill of Rights is overcome, as the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said.

[David Howarth]

The Government should therefore say categorically in reply to the debate that they do not intend the amendment to override provisions in the Bill of Rights that forbid the courts from interfering with what happens in the House. However, as the hon. Gentleman said, if they say that that statutory form of words is not intended to have legal effect, why have they introduced the provision, as there does not appear to be an enforcement mechanism? They are therefore left in an obvious dilemma: either they add words to the statute that do not have any effect, or they must do what should always be done in the circumstances—if one does not want words to have legal effect, one leaves the matter to convention or to the Standing Orders of the House, which are not justiciable. I fail to see why the Government have not taken that route.

My main argument concerns new clause 14. The procedural protections against the misuse of the Bill are still required, even though yesterday changes were made to the purposes for which the Bill can be used and to the subject matter to which it can apply. It can no longer be used to change itself, or to change the Human Rights Act 1998. However, we did not debate a far more important restriction—the proposal that the Bill should not be used to change any of the country's constitutional arrangements. We did not discuss that amendment, so it is possible to use the Bill for those purposes. Yesterday, we examined the example of changes to trial by jury, which is not protected by the Human Rights Act. The Bill could be used to make dramatic changes to that right, and it is still possible to reform local government using an order under the Bill. There is therefore a great need for procedural protections, which is why we have proposed such protections in new clause 14 in addition to the so-called Committee veto, which, as everyone knows, is not a veto.

The only argument against our proposal is that it will set a dangerous precedent. That argument suggests that we should not do the right thing now for fear that our slightly dim successors will not be able to tell the difference between the problem that we face and the problem that they face. Nevertheless, new clause 14 is not a departure, because there are such mechanisms, albeit with a slightly different construction, in Standing Orders. Standing Order No. 92 deals with what happens when a Bill has been considered by a Second Reading Committee or by the Scottish Grand Committee. The Report stage could take place in a Special Committee or in a Scottish Grand Committee. Standing Order No. 92 says that if a motion is introduced in the House to allow for that and 20 Members rise in their place and object,

"the Speaker shall declare that the noes have it."

Standing Orders already provide a blocking mechanism on procedure that requires a fuller hearing of the matter—in this case, the Report stage—than would otherwise be the case. That is precisely what we are trying to do in new clause 14.

Mr. Gale : The hon. Gentleman has the text of the Standing Orders before him, and he is quite right. I do not have the text with me, but I think that I am right that it does not specify that those Members should come from more than one party in the House.

David Howarth: The hon. Gentleman is quite right—the standing order does not provide that extra protection. However, new clause 14 does so: Members who object to the use of the procedure should not all come from one party.

Mr. Heath: Another blocking mechanism can be deployed by a minority of one. It is often seen and heard on Friday afternoons when we debate private Members' Bills. It is usually the role of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) to shout, "Object", thus preventing the progress of such Bills. A blocking minority can therefore act to procedural effect.

David Howarth: Indeed, that is a blocking minority of one from one political party.

The purpose of new clause 14 is to protect minorities. It provides geographical protection—we have heard the point about local Acts—and it also protects political minorities in the House and within parties. A matter can be controversial for a substantial number of Back Benchers, but it may not be controversial for their Front-Bench spokesmen. We need a mechanism that allows such minorities not to block the progress of legislation completely, but to demand further debate.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Gentleman is kind in accepting interventions, but he has contradicted himself. He says that the provision is meant to protect minorities, including minorities in a single party. Forgive me, but it is not inconceivable that 70 members of the parliamentary Labour party would disagree with their Front Bench, as they often do so at present. If they wished to object, but did not receive any support from the Opposition, their objection could not be heard under his proposal.

David Howarth: At least the position of those Members would be better than it would be if the new clause is not accepted. The hon. Gentleman, if I may say so, is making the best the enemy of the good.

The purpose of the new clause is to make sure that in circumstances where the matter before the House is controversial in the minds of a sufficient number of Members, the full Bill procedure will be used. The main problem that we have had with the Bill all the way through is that Ministers have told the Committee that they did not intend to use the procedure for controversial matters, but they have not been prepared to offer any substantive definition of "controversial". That is why, to extract Ministers from that difficulty, Members on the Liberal Democrat Benches and in other parts of the House have tried to solve the problem procedurally. New clause 14 offers, in effect, a procedural definition of what is controversial.

I cannot understand why the Government resist. They do so, presumably, because they do not want written into the Bill matters that could possibly become subject to judicial review. They want to protect themselves from the courts, but, with their own system of a Committee veto, they are offering a line of argument that may well lead to the Committees of the House being subject to exactly the same review in the courts. I find that to be precisely the wrong way round. It ought to be Ministers, more than Committees of the House or the House itself, who are subject to the courts.

Mr. McFadden: May I begin by offering the House a point of information relating to a point of order raised earlier about the regulator's compliance code? I am advised that that was sent to the joint Chairmen of the Standing Committee which considered the Bill on 3 April, and that copies of that draft have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, so I believe the document is available, even though—

Mr. Heald: The Minister may know that that has been the subject of discussion between one of the Ministers' offices and my own. I think it was I who raised the matter in Committee and asked that the code be made available to Members, and I was given no notification at all when the letter was sent to the Committee Chairmen. We were left floundering about, not knowing that it was in the Library. That was most unhelpful.

Mr. McFadden: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. I was trying to be helpful to the House by providing the information that I could find today about how the document had been distributed.

Andrew Miller: For clarification, the letter to which the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) referred was the subject of a parliamentary question that I tabled, so it was in the public domain and he could have found it.

Mr. Heald: It is pretty discourteous for the matter to be left in that way, when I had specifically raised it in Committee.

Mr. McFadden: May I suggest that we return to the issue at hand?

Listening to the contributions on the veto power, I am struck by a curiosity. Yesterday there were many contributions from hon. Members who argued that the powers set out in new clause 19, 20 and 21 were perhaps an improvement on the original version of the Bill, but that they were still far too wide. They could be used, for example, to abolish trial by jury—we heard that again a few minutes ago—introduce euthanasia, and possibly even recast our relationship with the European Union, yet today, in the discussion of the veto, which is related to those same clauses, the powers in them appear to have shrunk. We are told that the veto is not worth much because it is related to those powers, which yesterday were criticised as being so wide. Today they seem to have shrunk so much that they might not apply to our friend the Wolverhampton butcher. There is a curiosity in the criticisms of tying the veto to the powers set out in new clauses 19, 20 and 21.

Mr. Gale: In the light of the letter that the Minister kindly sent to me earlier today, which is about powers in new clause 19, can he explain what he had in mind when he wrote that letter?

Mr. McFadden: With the Deputy Speaker's permission, I am happy to do so.

The legal effect of new clause 19 relates to the power to remove or reduce burdens. The purpose for which the power can be exercised contains two alternatives. The first is the removing or reducing of any burden resulting for any person directly or indirectly from legislation. The second is removing or reducing the overall burdens resulting for any person directly or indirectly from legislation.

Removing or reducing a burden from one person may increase the burdens upon others, so the first alternative could permit an overall increase on persons as a whole. For example, where a regulatory regime is being placed on a risk basis, costs on low-risk businesses could go down, while costs on high-risk businesses may go up.

The second alternative requires a removal or reduction of burdens overall, although this would permit the imposition of new burdens where the overall effect was a removal or reduction of burdens. This is similar to the position under the 2001 Act; if a burden is removed, new burdens may be added. Orders as a whole, including any new burdens, must meet the safeguards, including, for example, being proportionate to the policy objective of the order.

In particular, I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the precondition in clause 3(2)(c), which requires that Ministers consider that the provision as a whole "strikes a fair balance between the public interest and the interests of any person adversely affected by it".

This precondition, which is clearly particularly relevant where burdens are imposed or increased, also mirrors the existing position under the 2001 Act. The explanatory document will include both a summary of consultation responses, and an assessment of the extent to which an order to be made under new clause 19 removes or reduces burdens. Also, a detailed impact assessment would be provided, where appropriate, and these documents would explain the rationale behind the proposals.

The expectation is that in most cases the overall burden will have been reduced, but for the reason stated the Government believe that we need the flexibility to add burdens as well as remove them, if these burdens are to be useful in delivering better regulation.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the Minister for that explanation. In summary, when he replied yesterday to my question whether, on his interpretation of new clause 19,

"it may well result in this procedure being used in circumstances where overall burdens will be increased, rather than decreased"—[Official Report, 15 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 783.]

and he said no, what he really meant to say was yes.

Mr. McFadden: What I have set out would be the intention in most cases, but there is the possibility that I outlined to the hon. Gentleman a few moments ago.

Sir Robert Smith: Having clarified that and confirmed that the evidence from the Department to the Select Committee on Procedure was to the effect that burdens could be increased under the clause, is the Minister not creating the ground on which we need an effective and sophisticated veto system to ensure proper scrutiny, if the Government are to use a regulatory reform or regulatory deregulation Bill to increase the burdens on society? Measures should be properly and effectively scrutinised in the House to make sure that they do not unnecessarily increase burdens. We therefore need the amendments that we tabled to constrain the procedure through which the House might examine those burdens.

Mr. McFadden: Well, I think that that is what people call "a stretch", although I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need effective scrutiny procedures. If hon. Members allow me to proceed with my remarks, I shall set out how those scrutiny procedures will operate.

Government amendments Nos. 46 to 55 fulfil a commitment made in Standing Committee to provide parliamentary Committees in both Houses with a statutory power to veto orders. Noting concerns about the procedural safeguards in the Bill, Government amendments provide that Committees can veto orders under any procedure; negative, affirmative and super-affirmative.

I want to stress at the outset the important point that the Government have given careful consideration to the form that the promised veto should take. We have sought to listen and to respond to views on the issue raised during the passage of the Bill, including those of the Select Committees, most of the Chairmen of which have spoken, and we hope to continue that dialogue. I assure hon. Members that the Government will continue to listen to views on the most appropriate way to ensure that the safeguards in the Bill are effective and workable.

As has been said, the veto is not a blanket veto. Committees will, of course, be able to oppose an order on any basis that they choose, which is the case under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. Several hon. Members have asked me to clarify that matter, and I reiterate the Government's commitment not to push through orders in the face of Committee opposition. I must add that the Government have always adhered to that commitment in the operation of the 2001 Act.

Mr. Heath: The Minister has said that the Committee can reflect on any matter in reaching its recommendation. Government amendment No. 46 states that the criteria. How can that mean "anything"?

> "A recommendation may be made under subsection (2B) only if the committee considers"

Mr. McFadden: The statutory veto relates to the powers set out in the Bill. If it were operated, it would mean that the order could not continue to be made by the Minister. However, it would not constrain the Committee from opposing the order on other grounds, in which case the legal consequences would not be triggered and the Minister would seek to adhere to the terms of the undertaking. The statutory veto relates to the powers in the clauses that we discussed yesterday, but the Committee can express a view in other terms, should it wish to do so.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the Minister explain the logic of that proposition? He rightly accepts that the Select Committee will be totally unconstrained when it comes to considering the merits of an order, so if it wants to vote against an order or express a view, it can consider anything it likes. When it comes to what procedure should be followed, however, the Select Committee would be tightly constrained by the terms of the statute. What on earth is the point of allowing the Select Committee full discretion on debating the merits of an order, but to confine it so closely on the procedural point of cutting out parliamentary debate? There could be orders that the Select Committee is against, but on which it approves of the procedure, and there could be ones of which it is in favour, but on which it thinks that there should be full procedure, because it knows that many other hon. Members want to consider the matter. Why distinguish between the two?

Mr. McFadden: The position is symmetrical because the statutory veto relates to the powers in the Bill, which is the point made by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office in her intervention on the Chairman of the Procedure Committee. We were asked to introduce a statutory veto, but we were also asked to narrow the powers in the Bill. The Government amendments include a statutory veto, which relates to the narrowing of the powers in the Bill that the House agreed yesterday.

In the context of amendments to focus the order-making power more explicitly on better regulation objectives, it was considered appropriate for the veto to provide a symmetrical and focused check on that power. The Government consider it right that proposals are judged on the extent to which they deliver the regulatory reform agenda, and it is right that the proposals are judged on whether the conditions in the Bill are met.

First and foremost, the veto is intended to present an effective and workable mechanism to protect against the abuse of the order-making power in the Bill. To that end, the veto builds directly upon the strengths of the existing system for scrutinising orders. The conditions to which the veto is tied are consistent with those contained in the Standing Orders of relevant Committees under the 2001 Act, conditions against which Committees have previously tested and, in one case, rejected regulatory reform orders. The Government believe that those conditions continue to represent key indicators on whether a proposal is suitable for delivery by order.

Additionally, the veto addresses concerns surrounding a Minister's capacity to implement Law Commission recommendations "with changes", which has raised questions about the extent to which a recommendation can legitimately be altered when it is delivered by order. In a case in which a Committee judges a recommendation to have been changed to such a degree that the recommendation can no longer be seen to implement a recommendation of the Law Commission, the Committee can exercise the statutory veto. As has been noted, however, the Government acknowledge the need for continued discussion about the most appropriate way in which to take forward the provision of a veto for Committees, which is a delicate issue. As was said yesterday, one of the reasons why the Bill is delicate is that it touches not only on what the Executive may want to do, but on the relationship between the Executive and Parliament, which is why we are open to continued discussion on those matters.

Andrew Miller: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the tone that he is adopting and think that further discussion is necessary. Will he ensure that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) is covered in that discussion? It would be unacceptable to the House and, indeed, to the Executive if we were to end up in a position in which the work of a Select Committee could be subject to judicial review.

Mr. McFadden: I am happy to take that point on board in the ongoing discussions, in which I hope that the Chairman of the Regulatory Reform Committee will be an active participant.

A number of the Opposition amendments to new clauses 5, 6 and 14 and to Government amendments Nos. 46, 50 and 54 explore alternative arrangements for the veto. I hope that hon. Members will consider the issues raised during the debate and the rationale for focusing the veto on the powers and conditions in the Bill. I also hope that they are assured of our intention to continue to engage with Parliament on that issue.

Some of the amendments deal with the issue of where the responsibility for exercising the veto should lie. They specify that the Committee capable of using the veto should be one "with responsibility for the matter".

Presumably, the rationale behind the amendments is to open the issue of changes to the structure of Committee scrutiny of orders. For instance, the amendments would allow separate Committees to perform procedural matters and the task of reporting on the substance of a draft order. It seems appropriate for the scrutiny of orders to be performed by a single Committee, which would make best use of the understanding of an order built up by a Committee. The Government have assumed that the Regulatory Reform Committee in the House of Commons and the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee in another place will continue to perform those roles, but I stress that those matters are for the House and that, in principle, there would be no objection to other Committees with expert knowledge being involved in the scrutiny of draft orders.

As hon. Members know, it has been agreed to expand the remit of the Regulatory Reform Committee. The Government expect it to be appropriate for Standing Orders to reflect the potential need for the Committee to seek expert views from other Committees on particularly complex orders. As noted, that is ultimately an issue for Parliament to decide.

Hon. Members have also tabled amendments that would remove provision for the House to overturn a veto exercised by its responsible Committee. To provide that a Committee decision could override the opinion of the House would be an unprecedented step that ultimately could be unworkable in practice. In new clause 14, however, hon. Members suggest a mechanism for the House of Commons to exercise a veto, whereby if a certain percentage of MPs objected to an order in writing, that order would have to be withdrawn. That percentage is set at 10 per cent.

The Government are committed to ensuring that the procedural safeguards in the Bill are robust and effective. However, the amendments would create a somewhat arbitrary arrangement which, crucially, does not build on the strength of the existing system for scrutinising orders—namely, the detailed scrutiny given to orders by the specialist Committees. In any case, under the affirmative and super-affirmative procedure, a proposal must, following Committee scrutiny, pass to the House for affirmative resolution. Some hon. Members suggested that the House is excluded from these matters, but that is wide of the mark.

There was then a discussion on proposals for a two-year rule whereby once an order had been vetoed a Minister could not table a similar order for the next two years. I understand the reasoning behind those amendments. They seek to ensure that a veto system cannot be abused by a future Government, a point with which I have considerable sympathy, and which ultimately constitutes the rationale for Government amendments to introduce a veto into the Bill. However, we would want to avoid imposing an arbitrary restriction on the order-making process, and I am concerned that the amendments may do precisely that.

New clause 6 proposes that where either House decides within 21 days that an order is inappropriate for delivery under the order-making power, it should be the subject matter of primary legislation. That arrangement could be difficult to operate. The Cabinet Committee on the Legislative Programme takes decisions each year on which proposals the Government will take forward by primary legislation. As provided for in clause 12, the explanatory document will describe to Parliament why a proposal is suitable for delivery by order. The legislative programme is carefully planned, and adequate resources need to be in place to take forward a Bill. A procedure such as this, whereby an order could suddenly be translated into primary legislation, could cause unmanageable uncertainty and potentially create a very overcrowded legislative programme. I hope that hon. Members accept that we could not support such an amendment.

The Government recognise—this was touched upon—that there are issues surrounding the level of procedural detail that should be contained in statute and in Standing Orders. The Procedure Committee, for instance, has recommended that as far as possible the procedural requirements for scrutiny of orders should be left to House authorities. I have provided assurance that the Government will continue a dialogue with the Chairs of the relevant Committees about appropriate changes to Standing Orders, and I have confirmed, and am happy to confirm again, my intention to listen to views on this issue.

Our priority is to get the Bill right, to have a workable system of scrutiny, and to achieve the right balance between creating a power that is able to deliver the regulatory reform agenda and ensuring that effective and robust safeguards are in place. The veto clearly plays an important role in achieving that balance. The Government are confident that in the veto provided we have the substantial and workable safeguard that Committees have requested. However, we will continue to listen to views on the most appropriate form that the veto should take, both during the passage of the Bill and in relation to amendments to Standing Orders once the Bill has been passed.

Mr. Gale rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I thought that the Minister had sat down, and I think that my interpretation was correct. I call Mr. Jonathan Djanogly.

Mr. Djanogly: We have heard many significant concerns voiced by Members from all parties. We do not like the way in which the Bill is being taken through this House, and we do not like much of what it is in it, but, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said, we are putting up with it for the sake of deregulation.

It is somewhat bizarre to hear the Minister suggest that the wider veto is somehow related to there being narrower powers. We say that there must be safeguards and that there are not enough safeguards in the Bill as it stands, not least as regards the promised veto, which turns out in practice not to be a veto. I hear the Minister's offer of further consultation; we shall see. In the meantime, we had expected that a full and restrictive veto should be given to Select Committees, and we still expect that. On that basis, I intend to ask the House to divide on new clause 5.

Question put. That the clause be read a Second time:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Foster and Liz Blackman

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Gale: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to detain the House, but during the debate on the last group of amendments, I am fairly certain that I understood the Minister to respond to the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) by saying that it would be regrettable if a Select Committee were referred for judicial review. That is on the record. However, it is my understanding that Select Committees and the whole House are the subjects and beneficiaries of parliamentary privilege and could not be referred for judicial review. Can you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, either rule on it now or, if necessary, look further into it so that either you or Mr. Speaker can make a ruling?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member, who is an experienced Member of the House, knows that, strictly speaking, that is not a point of order for the Chair. It would draw the Chair into a matter that arose during a debate. Equally, he is experienced enough to know that, under the device of making a point of order, he has put his point on the record and we shall no doubt be able to resolve it and gain complete clarification in the course of the debate.

New Clause 15

SUB-DELEGATED LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS

'(1) Where, by an order under this part, the function of legislating has been conferred on a person, any legislation that person makes must be made by statutory instrument.

(2) The procedures specified in section 10 and section [Veto by specified number of Members of House of Commons] shall apply to any legislation made by any person on whom the power to legislate has been conferred under this part.

(3) Any person on whom the power to legislate has been conferred under this part shall be subject to the same duties to consult before exercising that power as those to which a minister of the Crown is subject under section 11.

(4) Legislation made by a person on whom the function of legislating has been conferred under this part—

(a) may not delegate further any power to legislate,

(b) may only be made for purposes for which orders under this part may themselves be made, and

(c) is subject to the same restrictions as orders under this part.'.—[Mr. Heath.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Heath: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 5, in page 2, line 16 [Clause 2], leave out '(functions of legislating or'.

No. 9, in page 2, line 21 [Clause 2], at end insert—

'(2A) Provision made under subsection (2)(a) may only confer functions relating to the functions of legislation subject to the provisions of section (sub-delegated legislative functions).

No. 7, in page 3, line 13 [Clause 4], leave out from 'on' to 'unless' in line 14 and insert 'any person'.

No. 8, in page 3, line 23 [Clause 4], at end add—

'(5) Subsection (1) does not apply to—

(a) provision conferring a function of regulating a profession on a body elected by members of the profession;

(b) provision conferring a function of regulating a trade on a body elected by members of the trade;

(c) provision conferring on a local authority, within the meaning of section 1 of the Local Government Act 2000 (c. 22), the function of legislating with respect to its area; or

(d) other provision specified by order made by a Minister of the Crown.

(6) An order under subsection (5)(d) must be made by statutory instrument.

(7) A Minister of the Crown may not make a statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (5)(d) unless a draft has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, each House of Parliament.".

Mr. Heath: The matter of the implied repeal of the Bill of Rights is of some consequence, and I think that it may well be a matter for the Chair or, indeed, Mr. Speaker, to protect the rights of the House, but that is not what new clause 15 is about. The new clause deals with the capacity conferred by the Bill to delegate the function of legislation. It is, at first sight, a rather extraordinary concept—the idea that Ministers might, by Order in Council, confer to any other person the function of legislating. Of course, delegated functions already occur through primary legislation in a number of cases, but when we asked Ministers—in Committee and elsewhere—exactly what they meant by the provision in the Bill, I have to say that the answers were less than convincing and less than adequate. There is no clear idea of why there is a need for Ministers to defer through an Order in Council what is the most important aspect of Parliament's work—the legislative function—to any other person. There is, I accept, an argument for allowing the function of levying fees or changing a fees regime to be delegated to another person, which is why we have framed our new clause in a different way from the amendment that we tabled in Committee, and why it does not deal with that issue.

We would have liked a full debate on this subject yesterday in the context of new clause 19, but as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, our procedure yesterday did not entirely allow for that. The new provision was originally in clause 2, but now lies in new clause 19 and the subsequent new clauses. We would have liked at that point to move amendments reducing the capacity to delegate the function of legislating, and to have divided the House on them.

Two things alarm us. First, we have to ask whether it is right to give, through secondary legislation, the legislative function to another person—whomsoever that may be—who is not a legislator; not a Member of this Parliament. The second and most relevant question is that even if one accepts the need to delegate the legislative function—which I do not—why on earth is the legislation that such a person can then create via the delegated power not subject to the same caveats to which the Minister who conferred that delegated function is subject? Why, moreover, is such legislation not subject to the same parliamentary protections—albeit inadequate, as we have just been debating—to which it would have been subject, had it been put through the House via secondary legislation?

The case is absolutely unanswerable. I am prepared to listen to arguments from the Minister on the need to delegate a legislative function, although I am still at a loss to know in exactly what circumstances such a power would be used. However, I will not accept, under any circumstances, that such a power should not be subject to the same restrictions, caveats and the so-called veto that we have applied to matters properly before legislators: in other words, Members of this House acting in a legislative capacity in a Select Committee or in a Statutory Instrument Committee.

The suggestion is entirely preposterous. I know that we sometimes seem to defer our legislative functions to all sorts of people, but at least we try to maintain the fig leaf whereby we legislate in this House on the basis of information that we have. Ministers will be allowed to wash their hands completely of legislation that is the product of this provision. They will not be interested in whether it complies with the regulatory principles or falls within the narrow constraints on Ministers' ability to delegate through such means, which we have just been discussing.

We must remember that we are talking about amendment to primary legislation. Primary legislation will go through all its parliamentary stages and, a few years later, a Minister will be able to say, "I'm going to amend this legislation, but I'm not going to tell you how. I'm going to delegate that function to another person whom the House does not know and whose capacity they do not know, in order that they can make amendments that the House does not know about, and which will never go back to the House for corroboration or scrutiny."

I do not think that that is the way that the House should do its business. It is an error of judgment. I know that the Minister will say, "It's nothing to worry about. We're only talking about a few learned bodies and things like that, and they must be allowed to make their own rules," but I do worry about it—that is my job. It is the job of all hon. Members to worry about whether we allow other people to make legislation on our behalf without the appropriate restrictions.

The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller), the Chairman of the Regulatory Reform Committee, also has amendments in this group. From his body language, it is clear that he shares some of our concerns and that he is itching to speak. Given the abbreviated time available I shall not delay the House, save to say that amendments Nos. 5 and 9 fall, as they apply to something that yesterday was deleted from the Bill by a decision of the House. However, new clause 15 is still relevant as it sets out the principles that should apply in this matter and would restrict the capacity to delegate the legislative function.

I hope that we will get satisfactory answers from the Minister, but I expect that he will not be able to satisfy my concerns as he has not put forward his own amendments to bring the delegated legislative function within the compass of his constraints. It is likely that I shall wish to divide the House, but I hope to get some support from other parties.

Conservative Members who share my concerns may feel put off because the new clause refers to the veto. They were unable to support that proposal earlier, but it has now been disposed of. This is an important issue and we must send the clearest possible message to the other place that it requires appropriate amendment. For members of the principal Opposition party to sit on their hands in respect of such an important matter would be extremely unhelpful, and I entreat them to show their support in the Lobbies, whatever their reservations about one small aspect of the new clause.

Andrew Miller: In view of the time, I shall be extremely brief. I wish to move the two amendments in my name, which fill the gap—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman does not have to move his amendments, but merely speak to the group.

Andrew Miller: Amendment No. 7 would change the default position and ensure that the positive and negative procedures that apply to Ministers would also apply to any grantee of the power to legislate, unless an exception applied as set out in amendment No. 8.

I shall give the House practical examples of how that would work. The North Western and North Wales Sea Fisheries Committee is made up of local authority appointees and others, including lay persons. It has been involved in long and complicated machinations about illegal cockle fishing on the Dee estuary with the Environment Agency Wales. A regulating order has been passed, but it needed the authority of the EAW and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. It would be intolerable if such a body could regulate on its own. I do not believe that that was the Minister's intention, or that of his predecessor, in drafting the order and my amendments are merely intended to help to resolve the situation. I could give further examples, but in view of the time and the fact that it is essential that we hear from the Minister on this important point, I shall conclude my remarks.

8.45 pm

Mr. Heald: The original Bill attracted widespread criticism because it allowed such wide sub-delegation. Throughout our proceedings, the Opposition and, indeed, the Liberal Democrats, have tried to frame amendments in a way that might lure the Minister into accepting them. We did not get far in Committee, but things are going a bit better now, so I hope that the Minister might at least give us some assurances about later stages of the Bill in the other place.

I accept that there could be one sub-delegation to achieve the mergers that we were talking about yesterday in respect of the Hampton review, where it might be necessary to allow sub-delegation to a regulator—a point that I discussed with the Minister's predecessor in Committee. However, to allow the possibility for continuous, chain sub-delegation, whereby there is sub-delegation to one person who has the power to make secondary legislation, including the power to sub-delegate again, and so on, is a bit much—or a lot too much. New clause 15 is aimed at that situation. I support the idea that there should be a limit to the amount of sub-delegation—the length of the chain.

The point that there should be proper consultation before the use of secondary legislation for such purposes is well taken, so although, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) rightly pointed out, I have reservations about subsection (2) of the new clause, given that the House did not vote for the provision that a veto by a specified number of Members of the House should be added to the Bill, I do not feel constrained by that technical point in supporting the new clause. We certainly support the new clause and I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response to it.

Mr. McFadden: I was pleased to hear that the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) accede to the case for sub-delegation in some circumstances. The question before us is twofold. New clause 15 suggests that those to whom powers are sub-delegated should be subject to the same parliamentary processes as a Minister making an order. Powers to legislate are already exercised by entities other than Ministers in situations where statutory instruments are not always appropriate—for example, there are local authority powers to make byelaws that are not subject to any parliamentary procedure, but instead have to be authorised by the Secretary of State and must have set model procedures. The conditions set out in the new clause would not cater for those powers and as a result would require extensive public consultation and parliamentary time when that would often be inappropriate or unnecessary.

David Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McFadden: Given the time available, I would rather make some progress.

When making an order that confers a power to legislate, the nature of that power will be considered on a case-by-case basis and the order will set out the appropriate procedural requirements, depending on whom the power is conferred and its subject matter. That is the best approach, rather than being too rigid.

In our short debate, there was a question about whether someone could "sell on" the power sub-delegated to them. No, they would not be able to do so.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I should like to press on.

Amendments Nos. 7 and 8, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), do not suggest that sub-delegation should not happen. He attempts to produce a list that defines to whom the phrase "any person" might apply. As with his contributions throughout these debates, there is much sense in what he suggests. There are various instances in which powers to legislate are exercised by bodies other than Ministers, and he has attempted to define some of them in amendment No. 8 and in his contribution. We do not propose to accept those amendments tonight, but I can tell him that the effort to define the term "any person" more clearly is something that we hope to reflect on, consider and return to, as the Bill makes progress in another place.

Mark Fisher: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the Minister giving way to the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. McFadden indicated dissent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister has concluded his speech.

Mark Fisher: Instead of intervening on the Minister, perhaps I can make one of the shortest speeches on record.

Will the Minister explain his assertion that the Bill does not allow the right to sell on legislation, to use his words? Perhaps he can point to where that is specified in the Bill.

David Howarth: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as doing so probably spoils his effort to make the shortest speech of the evening, but I should like to encourage him in his question. If the provision in the Bill that sub-delegates the power to legislate in the first place were to include the possibility of further sub-delegation, and that was part of the original order, there is no reason to believe that further selling on of the power to legislate should be excluded.

Mark Fisher: That is a fair point, but it does not address my point about where that is dealt with in the Bill. The whole House has been enormously impressed by the way that the Minister, having picked up this brief only about three days ago, has mastered the intricacies and nuances of a very difficult and incredibly important Bill that goes to the very heart of our parliamentary democracy. The House has noted the Minister's grasp of the issue and is very impressed by it—

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): But.

Mark Fisher: Not but—and I have spent some time reading the Bill and perhaps I have missed it, but I cannot see where the power not to sell on, in the Minister's words, is specified in the Bill.

Mr. McFadden: I adyise my hon. Friend to read paragraph 31 of the volume of Halsbury's Laws on administrative law and Bennion on statutory interpretation, where he will find the well-established legal principle that a statutory power must be exercised only by the person to whom it is given and that it cannot be sub-delegated to someone else, unless that it authorised.

David Howarth: That is the exactly the point—unless it is authorised.

Mark Fisher: The point is very well made from a sedentary position by the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth). The provision is qualified by the phrase "unless it is authorised". The House will be delighted by the parliamentary footnote. As someone who loves footnotes in books, I thought that the Minister's Halsbury footnote was a delight, but I hope that he will address the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Mr. McFadden: Perhaps I can help the House further. In the case of our Bill, explicit wording would be needed to authorise further delegation of legislative powers. Given that the Bill does not contain such provision, such further delegation would not be possible. The Bill does not say so in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mark Fisher: I hope that the Minister is right, but it is very worrying that this is a fundamental parliamentary principle and we have moments before the knife falls on the debate. There is no point in discussing that, but such things should not just be rubbed through like that and the House and the other place must return to these things not in a gabbled way under the edge of a knife falling on the debate, but in a serious way. I am sure that the Minister intends to justify the position, and I hope that he can do so with his mastery of the footnote. However, as things stand, I am more persuaded by what the hon. Member for Cambridge said from a sedentary position. He feels that there are problems. These matters are too serious to buff through.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): The key point is that if there is a statutory instrument or order under the Bill that enables sub-delegation, sub-delegation can ensue. Only if the original Bill contained a provision saying that there could not be sub-delegation would that be, subject to judicial review, ultra vires. That is what we are asking for.

Mark Fisher: I am afraid that these issues are too nice—in the true sense of the word—to tease out in three and a half minutes, but they are very important and we are going to have to come back to them. We cannot allow this legislation finally to pass on to the statute book without being clear about what we are doing. The Minister may be clear and he may well be right. He has earned the right to our confidence. He has shown that during the debate today and yesterday. However, we cannot afford to give him the benefit of the doubt. He has to justify that to the House. We have to be extremely careful about what sub-delegation we are making.

Rob Marris: In terms of what the Minister said in response to amendments Nos. 7 and 8, which were tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), can the Minister assure me—I was not clear from what he said—that he was minded to accept the spirit, if not the wording, of those amendments?

Mr. Heath: That was a short, but informative debate. I agree that the Minister has been doing a good job in rather disadvantageous conditions over the past two days. I hope that next time he comes before the House with a Bill, he has a better Bill to work with. His officials are rather over-reliant on interpretations from Halsbury and insufficiently prepared to look at the common sense of what is written in the statute. Quite clearly there is no exclusion in the statute in relation to sub-delegation—a quite proper matter for the House's concern.

The idea that the requirements on consultation, which are contained in clause 11, are an unsatisfactorily onerous duty for somebody who is legislating under a delegated function is quite wrong. If someone is making legislation that is binding on other people—even if it is only a few people—is it entirely improper that they should consult such organisations as appear to them "to be representative of interests substantially affected by the proposals"?

I would suggest not. It is proper for delegated functions of legislation to fall within exactly the same constraints and to have exactly the same terms of consultation and procedures as any other matter handled under the accelerated procedure.

We still have some very big question marks—notwithstanding the Minister's preparedness to talk to the Committee and perhaps bring forward further proposals at the next stage of the consideration of the Bill in another place. Who knows, he may bring forward things that are of interest at that point, but that will not happen before this House today and, on that basis, we must seek the advice of the House, and I will press new clause 15 to a vote.

Mr. Greg Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you confirm that parts 2 and 3 of this very important Bill will remain unscrutinised on Report and that that disgraceful state of affairs arises only because of the terms of the Government's own guillotine motion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can confirm only that it begins to look extremely improbable that the other parts of the Bill are going to receive consideration.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Amendment proposed: No. 46, in page 8, line 17 [Clause 14], leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) The Minister may make an order in the terms of the draft order subject to the following provisions of this section.

(2A) The Minister may not make an order in the terms of the draft order if either House of Parliament so resolves within the 40-day period.

(2B) A committee of either House charged with reporting on the draft order may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend under this subsection that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.

(2C) A recommendation may be made under subsection (2B) only if the committee considers that—

(b) any relevant condition in section 3(2) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(1); or

(c) the condition in section 3(4) is not satisfied in relation to any provision of the draft order referred to in section 3(3).

(2D) Where a recommendation is made by a committee of either House under subsection (2B) in relation to a draft order, the Minister may not make an order in the terms of the draft order unless the recommendation is, in the same Session, rejected by resolution of that House.'—[Mr. McFadden.]

Amendment proposed to the proposed amendment: (a), in line 5, leave out from 'with' to end of line 18 and insert

'responsibility for this matter may, at any time after the expiry of the 30-day period and before the expiry of the 40-day period, recommend that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the draft order.'.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Order for Third Reading read.

9.39 pm

Hilary Armstrong: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Let me begin by thanking a number of colleagues and others in the House. First, I must thank my ministerial colleagues the Parliamentary Secretaries to the Cabinet Office. I am sorry that one of them did not have a chance to demonstrate his skilful mastery of his brief, but my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) demonstrated effectively his ability to master a complicated brief in a very short time. I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice), for her expertise in dealing with the Law Commission aspect of the Bill. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), who is now Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, but who did so much of the work that produced the Bill in the form in which it has been debated over the past two days.

I am grateful for the constructive advice given by a number of Key Committees and their Chairs during the last few months on how best to frame the order-making powers in part 1, and on the parliamentary procedures for scrutiny of draft orders. I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller), to the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), and to my hon. Friends the Members for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore).

We have engaged in a lively and interesting debate over the past two days. Despite all the votes, I believe that there has been an advance that most Members throughout the House have recognised. We have sought to achieve a sensible balance between producing a Bill with the power to deliver better regulation—in which respect I confess we were ambitious—and ensuring that Parliament would play a full and constructive role in scrutinising proposals so that we could secure a better regulation agenda overall.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Well over a year ago, before the election, the Prime Minister made a fine speech about the importance of deregulation to his Government's plans. What will the Minister deregulate once the Bill has been passed?

Hilary Armstrong: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman knows that the Bill is only part of the Government's wide-ranging deregulation agenda. I look forward to working with him on a raft of measures in the public and private sectors to bring about much more effective operation. Perhaps he would like to share some of his ideas with me.

Mr. Redwood rose—

Hilary Armstrong: Not tonight. We have plenty of time, and I want to allow others to contribute to this debate.

I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman was not present earlier, but as was said a number of times today, the Bill does not stand in isolation, nor can we allow ourselves to consider it in a narrow way. It is part of a much wider Government agenda for cutting red tape in the public sector, businesses, charities and the voluntary sector. As part of that wide agenda, the Government are measuring the cost of all administrative burdens. The outcome of that work, and the concerted push across Departments for better regulation, will be reflected in concrete simplification plans from each Department which will be published this year. Attentive Members will be aware that that was announced in the Budget.

The challenge for the United Kingdom and all western countries is to drive up productivity and maintain competitiveness in the face of rising global competition. Essential to meeting that challenge is a regulatory regime that satisfies the needs of the public while imposing the smallest possible extra burden on businesses.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): This rhetoric is music to my ears, but may we hear just one example from the right hon. Lady—whom I greatly admire—of what the country will be rid of as a result of the Bill?

Hilary Armstrong: One idea that I have spent some time on, and which I will look at again in much more detail when I do not have to spend so much time on complex legislation such as this, is bringing inspectorates together. That will ease the burden on a range of public sector organisations and enhance the impact of these measures on the citizen.

Essential to meeting the challenge to which I referred earlier is a regulatory regime that meets the needs of the public, while adding the lowest possible burden to businesses. Let us think for a moment about that challenge. Today, Asia's manufacturing output is greater than Europe's. Its share of world consumption has risen from some 10 per cent. to nearly 30 per cent. in the past 20 years. In the next five years, China's economy will overtake Germany's, which is now the EU's largest economy. China's exports to the EU have grown by 100 per cent. in just the past three years. China and India are now turning out more engineers, computer scientists and university graduates—4 million a year—than the EU and the USA combined. As we all know, the gap in productivity and competitiveness between the USA and the EU is widening, not narrowing in the way that it should.

Mr. Chope: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Hilary Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman will understand that there are many potential gains that we can deliver if we maintain this agenda. Regulatory costs are estimated to be between 10 and 12 per cent. of gross domestic product, and the administrative and paperwork costs make up perhaps a third of that figure. As for measuring the administrative costs of regulation, as we are now doing on an even more ambitious scale, the Dutch Government discovered that they were 3.6 per cent. of GDP.

Mr. Chope rose—

Hilary Armstrong: Reducing those costs by a quarter over five years, as the Dutch are doing, could save us up to 1 per cent. of GDP. That is exactly the sort of approach that we should seek to adopt.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Heald.

Mr. Heald This Bill—

Mr. Chope: I am very grateful to the right hon. Lady for giving way to me, Mr. Speaker. You were obviously surprised by her generosity, but I am not. How is what she just said consistent with the concession that the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) made earlier today? He said that new clause 19 would enable overall burdens to be increased.

Hilary Armstrong: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we believe that, used properly, these provisions will reduce burdens. But as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East said, different sorts of burdens might arise.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Bigger ones.

Hilary Armstrong: If the hon. Gentleman is patient, I will explain. Regulation itself is not a bad thing; it is the manner in which it is imposed that is the problem. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will have a little patience, I will deal with that point now.

The Government's better regulation agenda is designed to reduce burdens without reducing the effectiveness of regulation or its outcomes, so we are not going to stop introducing new regulations when they are needed. The Government make no apologies for continuing to regulate to improve standards in public services, to promote competition, to ensure fairness at work, to help industry and to provide protection for consumers and the environment. Indeed, one of my right hon. Friends said to me earlier, "I hope that we're not so against regulation that we're going to send children back to work up chimneys again." Of course we are not.

The order-making powers in part 1 are intended to take their place among the number of mechanisms designed to turn the aims of better regulation into reality for the end user on the ground—for those in business who create wealth and jobs in our economy, and those in our public services, voluntary and charitable organisations who improve the lives of our citizens.

The World Bank survey published in September 2005 rated the UK second in the EU and ninth in the world for best business conditions. That and other independent reports show that the UK is doing well, but as I have said, the challenge from global economic development is huge. We must ensure that the UK remains competitive.

The order-making powers in part 1 will not be the appropriate or even the necessary mechanism for every better regulation initiative. In many instances, however, they will provide real tools, where appropriate, for Departments to pursue their ambitious plans for removing unnecessary regulatory burdens without having to fight for precious time on the Floor of this House.

The order-making powers as defined by the amended Bill are more fit for purpose than the powers in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 have proved to be.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Hilary Armstrong: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will forgive me, I must make progress, as we are nearly out of time.

In broad terms, that is because the rationale for using the better regulation powers will be outcome-focused on reducing costs or on removing obstacles to productivity, profitability or efficiency. They will not be limited by a very tight definition of legal "burdens"—a matter that I know that the House has explored in some depth.

The better regulation initiatives that this order-making power will allow us to deliver include the consolidation of legislation to make it easier to understand and work with, and the reduction or removal of administrative burdens such as form filling or requirements to give information. I am anxious to make progress, so I shall not list the initiatives' effect on many other matters covered in the debate over the past two days.

Mr. Garnier: Will the Minister give way?

Hilary Armstrong: No. Other hon. Members who have been here all day want me to get on with my remarks so that they can make a contribution.

We also need to enshrine it in statute that regulators, as defined and specified by order, must have regard to the statutory code of practice issued under this Bill. The concordat will be based on the Better Regulation Commission's five principles of good regulation. In the round, such initiatives should allow us to remove what business and others tell us time and again are unnecessary obstacles to their efficiency.

I had intended to say quite a lot about parliamentary procedure, but again, I shall cut that down. We have had a good and full debate on that, and the Government have made it clear that although we want to find an approach that does not place too much emphasis on our perception of how Parliament should act, we do not want to avoid the responsibility that Ministers must face in terms of how they behave. We have sought to get the balance right. We have listened carefully to what the House has said, and I have no doubt that we shall return to the matter.

Sir Robert Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Hilary Armstrong: I am sorry, but I must get on.

I want hon. Members to bear in mind the fact that the Government have a responsibility to ensure that the UK stands its ground in an increasingly dynamic and competitive global economy, and that regulation does not prevent our public servants and voluntary workers from serving our citizens. This Bill will allow Government to do that by providing mechanisms to deliver real and meaningful cuts in red tape on business, charities and voluntary organisations.

I want to leave hon. Members in no doubt that this Bill is needed. Business needs it, and is telling us so very loudly. Our dedicated public servants need it too, as do our hard-working voluntary and charity workers. It is an essential tool to maintain our competitiveness, safeguard our economic prosperity, reduce burdens on public services and improve the lives of all our citizens.

I commend the Bill to the House.

9.54 pm

Mr. Heald: I welcome the Minister to her new responsibilities. It is good to see her escape at last from the confines of the Whips Office, and we look forward to hearing her speak regularly. I join her in her thanks to the Select Committee Chairmen and all who have taken part in the discussions.

The Bill was a mess at the beginning. It was not even the Bill on which the Government consulted. The proposals on which they consulted were very different. There has been a constant battle to try to get a Bill that really tackles deregulation, because we certainly need one—my goodness, we do. With a Government who are passing 15 regulations a day and increasing the burdens on business, whose extra costs are £50 billion since 1997, we need a Bill—but not a bad one.

We struggled in Committee. I tabled all the amendments suggested by the Regulatory Reform Committee and many suggested by other Committees of the House. All were rejected; the then Minister used to described them as debating points. Recently, however, common sense has been brought to bear on the problems and there has been a climbdown. I welcome new clauses 19 and 20, but they came so late in the day that we have not been able to tackle all the problems with the provisions. We still have issues about how to tackle the problems of small business and how to filter Law Commission Bills so that the most controversial are properly debated. We still have issues about the procedures to be adopted to give the House a veto.

There are great time pressures tonight, so I cannot explain all the reasons why the Bill is not yet ready to become law, but I cannot stomach the idea that it should go to the other place with the approval of the Opposition.

Mr. Gummer: In the short time that my hon. Friend has been given, will he kindly tell the House what part of the Minister's speech had any relevance or reference to the Bill? Most of us were unable to link the speech to the Bill.

Mr. Heald: Like many Members on the Opposition Benches, my right hon. Friend has a proud record on deregulation. The Minister was talking about deregulation, but just as there can be no good regulation without the right culture, there can be no deregulation without the right sort of legislation, and the Bill has a long way to go.

Mr. Redwood: Did my hon. Friend find it as surprising as I did that after all those long debates, the Minister could not name one item that she would deregulate under the Bill? She said something about sorting out licensing that was not deregulatory, but she did not even seem to know about the Parliamentary Secretary's pledge to get rid of game licences. Does that mean that since yesterday, they have decided that they will no longer even get rid of game licences?

Mr. Heald: I will make one final point to show that the Bill is not good enough. The Department of Trade and Industry website shows new legislation proposed for the coming year. There are 40 pages of proposals. Nowhere in Government is there a similar website showing which measures will be deregulated. Until that happens, the Government will not solve the problems of their culture of regulation and burdens on business.

Andrew Miller: I should like to spend just one minute thanking hon. Members, including the members of Select Committees, for taking the work that we have done on the Regulatory Reform Committee so seriously. In particular, I thank the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, my hon. Friend the Member for East Renfrewshire (Mr. Murphy), for the work that he did when he was the Minister with responsibility for the Bill, and I thank the new Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) for the sympathetic way in which he has dealt with his new responsibility. We have made progress, but more steps are still necessary, and I urge Ministers to think carefully about the commitments that they have given during our proceedings over the past two days. I am certain that we will have a Bill that enables us to proceed productively, by deregulating in the way that all parties in the House want.

9.59 pm

Mr. Heath: This started off as a Bill with a benign intent, but it was nonsense, preposterous and deeply dangerous. It been marginally improved over the past two days, but there are still deep concerns about the way in which it will operate, deep concerns about its scope and deep concerns about the Government's inability to provide a proper veto. There is scarcely more than a caveat—

It being Ten o'clock MR. SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [15 May].

The House divided: Ayes 259, Noes 213.

PETITION

Council Tax

10.12 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I wish to present a petition from Clare Nunns that has been signed by 175 residents of Carshalton and Wallington. It concerns the IsItFair campaign to scrap the unfair council tax and replace it with a fairer system that is based on people's ability to pay.

The petition states:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons votes to replace Council Tax with a fair and equitable tax that, without recourse to any supplementary benefit, takes into account ability to pay from disposable income. Such tax to be based on a system that is free from any geographically or politically motivated discrimination and that clearly identifies the fiscal and managerial responsibilities of all involved parties.

To lie upon the Table.

Bowel Cancer

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Roy.]

10.13 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to talk about bowel cancer, because many members of the public and Members of the House have experience of members of their families, or perhaps themselves, having the prognostication of bowel cancer and know of its effects on their lives. We have a real opportunity in this country to make a difference on bowel cancer, which is often called colorectal cancer, but it is my contention that we are not doing that as quickly as, or to the extent that, we ought to be.

I do not want to go into the numbers, although we conventionally talk in such debates about the numbers of people who develop and die from a cancer. However, hon. Members can take it from me that the figure is up there in the thousands and thousands and that the problem is very serious indeed. The research that has gone on in this country and the United States will undoubtedly help us to tackle not only bowel cancer, but many other cancers. For example, in the United States, at the Johns Hopkins university in Baltimore, Bert Vogelstein has discovered something that is quite magnificent in the sense of what it tells us about the development of cancers. He has shown that five or seven individual events can take place, all of which are necessary to develop the full-blown cancer, which sadly can kill. The genetic changes that he has identified are an important illustration of what research can do. The interesting thing is that the order in which they happen is not A, B, C, D, E, F, G and so on, but A-C, E-F and so on in different individuals. As a New Statesman article next week will prove, that shows that cancer research is telling us much more about how cancers progress from one stage to the next. It is not that someone has it and everything else is inevitable. The research shows that early detection not only of a genetic event, but of other events as well, is important and can help to save lives. My contention is that we can save thousands of people's lives if we take the subject much more seriously.

Many people will say that bowel cancer is caused by diet and we can prevent it by taking care of what we eat. Lots is going on in that sector, but it is not the subject of the debate. We must have a process of screening individuals, and it is which individuals and when we screen them that is the subject of the debate going on not just in this country, but across the world.

We have been lucky with some of the research into bowel cancer because we can say things about the disease that we cannot say about other important cancers. The major screening programmes are for cervical cancer, breast cancer and bowel cancer, but bowel cancer is the only disease for which we have additional information about the stages that happen in the process. We have not quite reached that point with the other cancers.

How do we screen individuals? People can look at their stools and faeces—I cannot use rude words in the Chamber, but I hope that people know what stools and faeces are—for blood that might be present. They can do it themselves by taking the stool and faeces and passing it on to the experts to analyse whether blood has been exuded from the body. If it has been, further tests can be done. The faecal occult test—it sounds like a religious group—is used for men and women aged between 60 and 69. It is very effective in what it does, because the next stage illustrates what we can do with the result. However, we need to ask why 60 to 69—why not 70, 75, 80 and so on? That is true for many other screening technologies, including breast cancer.

If there is evidence that blood is exuded by an individual, the next process is flexible sigmoidoscopy, which has been used in pilot studies of people aged over 50. A small flexible tube, with a camera attached, is inserted through a person's rear passage. We would not all welcome that, but it does happen. I and others I know have been through that. It is quite exciting to lie there and look at one's insides—parts of our bodies that we have not seen before—on a screen. It is better done after lunch and dinner, of course, and certainly after breakfast. However, it is interesting what one can see.

It is possible to see lesions and polyps on the screen. Polyps are little structures that may have developed at a certain stage in someone's lifetime, perhaps over a period of eating certain foods, or whatever the factors are that induce their existence. When the doctor sees those structures, he gets the message. One can eliminate those polyps, which appear at an extremely early stage in the development of bowel cancer, and people can survive for many years if they do not develop the disease. Flexible sigmoidoscopy is an important procedure in identifying the early stages of bowel cancer.

The cancer can develop beyond that stage and, sadly, it has done so in most of the cases with which I am familiar, including that of my brother. Very little can be done, as the cancer has entered a different phase and spread to the liver. In such cases, even surgery will not extend someone's life by many years, so early detection is extremely important. Removal of the polyps is even more important, as mutations, changes and so on can be detected in those structures. Rectal insertion is not the only technology used to tackle the disease. New scanners have been developed that allow us to look at people's insides, so we can discover the polyps in their bowels without inserting an instrument in their rear passage.

We can argue about whether people should be screened at 50, 60, 69 and so on, but we need to consider the issue of take-up. Thankfully, the Government have introduced screening, but take-up is only 60 per cent. That is understandable, as people do not want to undergo such a test. Men, in particular, do not like such procedures or the effects on their bodies. The position is even worse for certain groups, where take-up is less than 60 per cent. Screening is not worth while if people do not use it. Recently, I received a paper from Warwick, De Montfort and Essex universities on take-up among black and ethnic communities. Before rectal insertion, a faecal occult blood test is necessary: people collect three samples over three days—goodness knows where they keep them, as they cannot be stored in a fridge with food—and send them for analysis. For various cultural reasons, black and ethnic communities do not like to take that test. That is understandable—my researchers, who come from different cultural backgrounds, said that it was disgusting. The take-up among much of the multi-cultural community therefore falls below 60 per cent. to 30 per cent. and even lower. We await better tests, as many people are not taking up that test.

The national health service records the results of the tests, and flexible sigmoidoscopy is carried out. The problem of take-up has been tackled by Cancer BACUP, which has produced leaflets encouraging people to take the test. It has a great deal of experience of talking to people with breast and cervical cancer, urging them to take tests that can save their lives. However, low take-up is a huge dilemma, and I urge the Government to increase it. I do not think that we will ever achieve 100 per cent. take-up, but we can do better than 20 or 30 per cent. in certain communities. Indeed, we can do better than 60 per cent.

There is inequality in our society, and not just in black and ethnic groups. The politics of cancer in the United Kingdom is the politics of deprivation and the poverty of many people. Not only do they suffer more pollution and eat cheaper, poor quality food, but they do not take up the diagnostic tests. I run the all-party cancer group. Our conference this year, "Britain against Cancer", will be about the inequalities in our society, where certain groups of people who come from certain backgrounds do not take up the tests that are available.

I urge the Government to regard that as a priority and to do more about it. It is all right to say, "Eat more fruit. Eat more organic food," but as I know, the surge in the green vote in Norwich, which is all about eating organic fruit, involves the middle classes. On the working class estates in my constituency, people do not eat organic foods. They go to Lidl and buy food as cheaply as they can. The difference in the diseases that they get reflects the difference in lifestyle. We must take on the class problem and factors such as what people eat, where they live, the pollution that they encounter, and so on. I urge the Government to do more about that.

I know that the Department of Health is trying to do more and to induce people to be tested. The Department must speak much more to the relevant charities and groups. Bowel Cancer UK and Beating Bowel Cancer have great experience of talking to the population and thinking about the problems. We need a taskforce to encourage people to come forward and take the test.

What have the Government done? In no way am I suggesting that they have done nothing. They have, for example, set up various pilot schemes, which have been quite successful. In certain parts of the midlands they have saved around 250 lives. Saving 250 lives by testing for bowel cancer is pretty good news. We could make that 20,500 lives if we extended it to other parts of the country. There have been some delays in getting money into such programmes, but in April 2006, after a little flurry here and there, we managed to get £10 million for the first year of a bowel cancer screening programme, with the help of the national cancer screening programme. That is good, but what will happen in years 2 and 3?

At a Britain against Cancer conference, the then Minister spoke of a three-year programme tackling bowel cancer. There is some scepticism about that. I want to hear tonight, please, that years 2 and 3 will happen. We have a hub and a screening centre, but we promised that there would be five hubs and 13 screening centres across the country. It has been proven that the one existing hub and the screening that is going on can save lives, and we could save many more lives. There is very good news. It is a winner, and do we need winners in this area of health! Does the Minister agree?

When people die of bowel cancer, I find it difficult not to wonder why the disease was not diagnosed sooner, why the treatment was not effective, why the polyp was not removed and so on, and why their lives were not saved. That is a challenge for the Government. We need to discuss how we will raise awareness, engage the charities, get leaflets out, engage with the communities and at what level, to make sure they know that there is good news and that the technology for dealing with the disease is improving.

We need to know where the programme will happen. I will love it when it is rolled out in Norwich and Great Yarmouth—everything happens there eventually—and the pilots seem to have been effective.

We need to know whether the Government have estimated how many lives might be saved, and I wonder whether the NHS can find the extra money. It was said that some £35 million would be found over three years, but will that happen? When will we know that the money is in place for years 2 and 3?

We must consider the capacity issues. What about the personnel who will conduct the tests? We need nurse specialists to look after patients, cancer doctors, pharmacists and stoma nurses. I do not think that people will not respond because of the nature of the cancer.

I want to hear from the Minister tonight that the programme will happen over the next three years, the three years after that and the three years after that, because it is a win-win situation. If the programme is successful in bowel cancer, progress will be made on prostate cancer, because there will be discoveries in that field, too—there will be discoveries across the spectrum of cancers over the next few years. We can show in this country that the best treatment for any particular cancer comes from early screening.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing this important Adjournment debate on what all hon. Members regard as an extremely important issue. I am not sure whether I thank him for going into so much detail in describing the nature of the condition and some of the treatment, but he brought the matter to life and revealed the reality of what many individuals go through at a very stressful time in their lives.

I want to put the matter in context before responding directly to some of my hon. Friend's specific questions. Bowel cancer is the second largest cancer killer in England, accounting for more than 14,000 deaths a year. Around 28,000 bowel cancers a year are diagnosed, and, sadly, the disease has historically poor survival rates. It can be difficult to recognise bowel cancer, as symptoms are often not reported at an early stage and can be similar to less serious conditions, which is why we need, as my hon. Friend has said, a proper national screening programme.

Research undertaken in Nottingham and Denmark in the 1980s showed that screening men and women for bowel cancer using the faecal occult blood test could reduce the mortality rate from bowel cancer by 15 per cent. in those screened, and an independently evaluated pilot in Warwickshire and Scotland showed that that research can be replicated in a national health service setting. Based on the final evaluation report of the pilot and a formal options appraisal, we announced that the NHS bowel cancer programme would begin screening men and women aged 60 to 69 from April 2006.

I can confirm that the bowel cancer screening programme is definitely being rolled out over the next three years, as confirmed in the White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say", which was published in January. The programme is one of the first national bowel cancer screening programmes in Europe, and the first cancer screening programme in England to involve men as well as women.

My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that we have always intended to have a three-year phased roll-out of this substantial new national programme. However, we cannot put an entire screening programme in place in a single year. We estimate that around £10 million will be spent on the first year of the programme. Funding decisions have not yet been made for future years, but we are committed to ensuring that the necessary funding is available to see through the full implementation of the programme.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I share the admiration expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North for what the Government have done. I also appreciate that the health service is a devolved issue in Scotland, and we all want to see a standard service across the country. The screening programme in Scotland will not begin until March next year, which is some 11 months late. However, it covers an age range of 50 to 74, which is far more significant than that covered in England. I hope that as we progress through the three-year programme we will start to extend the age range that is covered.

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend makes an important point. As we progress through the three-year period and the screening programme develops, we will keep that under review and look to learn from our Scottish colleagues.

It is probably useful for both my hon. Friends to be aware that 100,000 testing kits have been ordered from the supplier for the purposes of the necessary screening programme. We estimate that between 100,000 and 120,000 men and women will be screened by the programme by March 2007. We believe that a very innovative model has been developed for our national bowel screening programme. For example, men and women will be sent a testing kit to complete in the privacy of their own homes. My hon. Friend referred to the importance of dignity and sensitivity in the way that we handle this. We believe that about 2 per cent. of those who take the faecal occult blood—FOB—test will be positive and will be invited for a full colonoscopy. It is likely that about one in 10 of those will be found to have bowel cancer. It is probable that a further four out of 10 will be found to have polyps that can be treated to prevent the possibility of bowel cancer developing at all.

When fully rolled out, the programme is expected to detect around 3,000 bowel cancers a year. As my hon. Friend said, five programme hubs across England will invite men and women to participate in the programme, sending out FOB testing kits, interpreting the kits and sending out results. There will then be 90 to 100 local screening centres providing endoscopy services for the 2 per cent. of men and women who have a positive FOB test result. The pilot in Rugby will continue to run to the end of March 2007. The first of the five programme hubs will also be established in Rugby because of the substantial experience and expertise gained through the pilot. That programme hub will start by inviting men and women in Wolverhampton to participate in the screening programme. It will eventually cover the west midlands and north-west England. NHS cancer screening programmes are currently assessing where the other programme hubs will be located, and announcements will be made as soon as possible. We heard my hon. Friend's bid for his own part of the world, which would be expected in the course of such a debate.

We intend that by March 2007, all five programme hubs will be established and around 14 local screening centres will be operating. Last August, strategic health authorities were asked to bid for their local endoscopy units to become local screening centres as part of the first wave of the programme in 2006-07. Similar exercises will take place for the second wave in 2007-08 and the third wave in 2008-09. It is up to SHAs to decide where local screening centres should be located for the benefit of their own populations. In particular, SHAs need to take into account the efficiency of their service for patients with bowel cancer symptoms to ensure that those are not affected by the local introduction of bowel screening.

Preparations for the roll-out of the programme have been going on for some years. As my hon. Friend said, training in the necessary bowel scoping is vital to the diagnosis of bowel cancer. A national training programme has been established to train specialist staff to carry out vital procedures for diagnosing bowel cancer. Based on current trends and definitions, the training programme is projected to develop training for 1,573 specialists by 2006-07.

Dr. Gibson: Will my hon. Friend say something about how we are going to increase awareness in people about having this particular test, because unless they think that it is going to preserve their life, they will not undertake it?

Mr. Lewis: I will come to that in the moment.

I want to spend a couple of minutes on research, because I know that my hon. Friend rightly has a long-established track record in being concerned about that. I can assure him that as we roll out the bowel screening programme nationally, it will be fully evaluated. We are also looking at flexible sigmoidoscopy, which is another potential way of screening for bowel cancer using a flexible bowel scope. Based on the promising results of a Cancer Research UK trial, we are funding a demonstration study at St. Mark's hospital, and inviting men and women aged 58 to be screened. The study is costing £300,000 and is expected to report in two years.

My hon. Friend has just asked me about communications. We established a bowel cancer communications group in 2005 with representatives from some of the organisations that he mentioned earlier, including Cancer Research UK, Bowel Cancer UK, Beating Bowel Cancer, Cancer BACUP and the Men's Health Forum. I would like to pay tribute to those colleagues in the stakeholder groups for their hard work and support in taking this forward. The communications group is considering all aspects of communications, including reaching ethnic minority communities—my hon. Friend also raised that issue—as well as people from deprived areas and hard-to-reach groups. Bowel cancer screening leaflets, which will be sent out with each invitation, will be translated into a number of languages, as happens now in breast and cervical screening. Lessons are also being learned on how to reach these groups from the existing breast and cervical screening programmes and from the bowel cancer screening pilot.

The screening programme will save thousands of lives, but we are also taking further steps to tackle the disease. As my hon. Friend said, poor diet is associated with bowel cancer, and our five-a-day programme is promoting the increased consumption of fruit and vegetables. Early detection other than through screening is also important. That is why we are working with professionals and key stakeholders to develop awareness programmes. We are also looking at decision-supporting tools to aid GPs in referring patients appropriately.

On the treatment side, we are funding a multi-disciplinary training programme in a precision technique called total mesorectal excision, which results in lower rates of recurrence of cancer and the reduced need for long-term colostomy. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence published updated guidance in "Improving Outcomes in Colorectal Cancer" in June 2004, and it has published appraisals on the use of five drugs for the treatment of advanced bowel cancer.

I hope that I have demonstrated to my hon. Friends that the Government are fully committed to tackling cancer, and to the full implementation of the national health service bowel cancer programme. Bowel cancer is a serious condition that acutely affects not only the individuals concerned but their families and loved ones. It is time that we took the issue seriously and understood the potential consequences to individuals and to society of this horrendous disease. The Government can be proud of their record in putting in place a national screening programme for the first time. However, we cannot afford to be complacent. One life lost to the disease is one too many, and we have a solemn duty to do everything that we can to ensure that we detect the condition and treat it quickly, so that people do not have to suffer the horrendous consequences that have, sadly, led to deaths of far too many people in our society over the years.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this Adjournment debate and shining a light on this important issue. Some people might find it difficult to talk about, but it is extremely important that parliamentarians consider the issue, and I am delighted that he has asked the Government to account for themselves tonight—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Departmental Staff

1. Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): How many staff will be working in his new office. [71279]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): As the House will be aware, that very much depends on the role of the Deputy Prime Minister, which varies under different Prime Ministers and Governments. I will have the support of a private office, a secretariat and the Cabinet Office, as is relevant to my role. The Prime Minister today announced the responsibilities that are being given to me in my role as Deputy Prime Minister. Those details are available in the Library of the House.

"I think the Prime Minister felt that I was able to play a role—a more central role—in Government than I could have done when I had a huge Department to run, and was deeply involved in the day-to-day activities of a Department. If I was to play a more central role then I think it was understandable that I would be removed from front-line administration of one of Whitehall's largest Departments and that is what happened."

That is not my description of the Deputy Prime Minister's role; it is Lord Heseltine's description when he appeared before a Committee of this House in 1996. I think that it is right and I endorse his interpretation of the role.

Mr. Wilson: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that, but I am not sure that he answered the question that I laid before him. What steps will he take to ensure that staff working under him are not subject to sexual harassment or bullying?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Staff work to the civil service code. It is their responsibility, and that of the Cabinet Office, to implement that.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that many in the Labour party and the country are very proud of the role that he has played as Deputy Prime Minister. We are pleased to hear that his Cabinet Office responsibilities—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is too much noise in the Chamber. Remember this; I am always able to go from one question to another if I get this behaviour. That would mean that there would be no supplementary questions and that Front-Bench Members would be denied an opportunity to ask questions.

Anne Snelgrove: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, there is a great deal of pride in the party and the country about the role that the Deputy Prime Minister has played. In particular, we are pleased to hear that his responsibilities have now been defined. Perhaps he could tell us how many of his staff will be responsible for the extended responsibilities that he is taking on.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for her supportive remarks; any more would be very welcome today. Let me make it absolutely clear that those responsibilities are both international and domestic and include Cabinet Committees, far more of them than is the case with any other Deputy Prime Minister. The support role and the numbers are being worked out. Obviously, until that has been concluded, we are not able to give a precise answer.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Is not the blunt truth that the Deputy Prime Minister's principal role is, as his party chairman said, as a political broker—a sort of marriage guidance counsellor between No. 10 and No. 11? Will he assure us that the civil servants in his office will not be dragged into those squabbles, and should not the Labour party being paying the bill?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I recommend that the hon. Gentleman read the Select Committee reports from when Lord Heseltine was giving evidence on the definition of the Deputy Prime Minister's role. It was made absolutely clear that civil servants were used as cheerleaders under his office. That had to be changed. It is not the intention to use civil servants in that way. Let me be clear that the office that Lord Heseltine defined is exactly the one I accepted. He also said in his evidence that he chaired a number of Cabinet Committees. That is true, but I will be chairing two or three times as many as he did. He also said:

"I have the responsibility for the presentation of Government policy".

Within two years, we had a majority of 169—it does not sound as though his presentation worked too well.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Regulation

2. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): What steps she plans to take to take to contribute to lifting the burden of regulation on business and industry. [71280]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Pat McFadden): The Government are committed to a radical agenda of regulatory reform. In the March 2005 Budget, they announced a programme to lift the burden of regulation. They have engaged with business and industry and are undertaking measures to reduce unnecessary and burdensome regulation. Last but by no means least, we are legislating to make it easier to reduce unnecessary or outdated regulatory burdens on business, charities and the voluntary sector.

Gordon Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for that response and welcome him to his new position, in which I am sure that he has experienced great joy in the past few days. In my constituency of Ochil and South Perthshire in Scotland, a number of businesses are creaking under the burden of regulation. Is he being bold enough in his attempts to address that?

Mr. McFadden: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. The strong and stable economy that we have enjoyed in recent years is of course essential to business growth and business health. In addition, all Government Departments have been asked to produce a plan to cut unnecessary red tape by the time of the pre-Budget report later this year. However, businesses in my hon. Friend's constituency and, indeed, throughout the country will want to know why the Conservative party voted against the Third Reading of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill yesterday. Conservative Members say that they want to reduce the burden of regulation, but when it came to action, they voted against the Bill.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The Minister has walked into a bit of a trap, if I may say so. Given the vast amount of European over-regulation that accumulates as burdens on business, will he explain why his Bill does not include an express override of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993 so that the judiciary can ensure that we do not have the burdens on business that European legislation provides?

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman must face up to the fact of our membership of the European Union, however much he dislikes it. He will also be aware that the Bill to which I referred contains measures to enable Departments not to gold-plate European directives when they are introduced in this country.

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): One of the problems that I find when I visit businesses in Stourbridge is complaints about the number of regulators with which they must deal. What are the Government doing to simply the process?

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend might be aware that as a result of the Hampton review, over the next three years, 31 existing national regulators will be consolidated into seven.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): With an average of 3,800 regulations now being imposed on British business a year, will the Minister tell us how many he proposes to abolish next year?

Mr. McFadden: Given the way in which the hon. Gentleman's party voted last night, he, by his actions, is making that process more difficult. However, happily, the Bill was passed, which will mean that when Departments come up with their simplification plans by the time of the pre-Budget report, we will have an Act in place that will make it much easier to remove outdated and unnecessary burdens on business, charities and the voluntary sector.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): One of the complaints that I get from businesses in my constituency is about the alleged gold-plating of EU legislation. What are the Government doing about that?

Mr. McFadden: Business is rightly concerned about that. My colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry are taking action to reduce the problem. I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that the Bill that was passed last night makes it easier to address the problem of gold-plating, so that when we have an agreement on a new directive in Europe, the problem will not be added to through the way in which that is implemented in this country.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Pensions

3. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): What role he has in the formulation of public sector pension policy. [71281]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): As well as being involved in recent discussions and the Cabinet Committee on the development of pension policy this week, hon. Members will be very aware that I have been closely involved in discussions on the local government pension funds. As the Prime Minister has made clear, there are some very tough decisions to be made and difficult negotiations to be undertaken, and I will be heavily involved in them. I am, of course, aware of the need for fair and affordable pensions for public sector workers. The matter affects all Government Departments, and I shall continue to seek the best way forward across the Government as a whole.

Mr. Boswell: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his reply. While I am sure that the House will understand his interest in safeguarding his personal financial affairs towards a time when he is perhaps less active than he has been, will he meanwhile examine the whole spectrum of national occupational pensions policy? Public sector pensioners can continue to enjoy a retirement age that is protected at 60, yet yesterday's news from a major clearing bank indicated that there are still significant and systemic cutbacks in the private sector. Does he really feel that that is fair? Is there not a two-tier—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point about the difficulties in pension policies and the range of considerable differences between the different pension policies within the public and the private sector. We will try to iron out those difficulties, come to an agreement and, I hope, achieve consensus with the Opposition as well as the other parties involved.

I think that the hon. Gentleman was a Pensions Minister in the last Conservative Government; certainly, at one stage he was their spokesman on pensions. I will not take any lectures about pensions after 18 years of a Tory Government, who put millions of our pensioners into poverty, took away their fuel payments and brought about the most disastrous conditions. It took this Government to introduce pension credit, with today's pensioners better off than any other generation of pensioners. Some 2 million pensioners have been lifted out of poverty. We will not take any lectures from Tories about the pensioners in this country.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to settlements that are both fair and affordable. Does he agree that the principle established in some schemes, whereby the scheme for new entrants is separate from the one for those already employed, is one useful way forward?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend is right. The new negotiations have sought to differentiate between those entering a pension fund and those already in it. It is causing a bit of a concern, and it is a matter of some controversy. We will have to find answers to those difficulties. We face a range of differences, not only in Departments, but in the pensions for which they are responsible. I will do my best to see whether we can find common agreement, looking at all ways of getting a fair pension fund. However, I notice that the Opposition have stated that they would renegotiate the local government pension fund, or those that will be negotiated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Perhaps they could make their position clear on that.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): If the right hon. Gentleman wants lectures about pensions, he should talk to the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who has made it very clear that when Labour came to office we had some of the best pensions provision in Europe and now we have some of the worst. What can the Deputy Prime Minister say about fairness to pensioners who pay the council tax and whose tax bills have rocketed by £250 this year when the architect of that disaster loses his job, yet still has three homes, two Jags and a fancy office in Whitehall?

The Deputy Prime Minister: For the record—though the hon. Gentleman would not know much about the record—I have one house and one car, which is 10 years old. I suspect that most Conservative Members have got much more than that.

With regard to pensions, we should be concerned about asking the pensioners themselves what they think about 2 million of them being forced into poverty conditions and not having enough money to heat their homes. They are the people to make judgments. The hon. Gentleman talks about private pension funds and what my right hon. Friend said, but we had to introduce the Pension Protection Fund and provide £400 million to help those who had failed to get what they deserved from their private pension funds.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The Deputy Prime Minister has had a long-standing involvement with the local government pension scheme. Will he use that experience in his new role to ensure that there is a common and united approach towards public sector pensions across government?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is aware that we have had a number of discussions in the past 12 months while I have been involved in the negotiations on a new local government pension scheme. He is right that there are differences in that fund and, indeed, that there is discrimination. Women are denied the possibility of having a fair pension fund, and we have had to make changes to it. Those orders are before the House. They will make things better, but the negotiations continue, as he knows. We want a fair and affordable pension scheme. That is the Government's aim and that is what we are negotiating.

Ministerial Responsibilities

4. Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): What policy responsibilities he will have in his new role. [71282]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): The Prime Minister has asked me to oversee and co-ordinate Government policy across the full range of the domestic policy agenda. To help achieve these objectives, I will chair nine Cabinet Committees including domestic affairs, which has wide-ranging responsibilities for delivering the Government's priorities. I will also actively deputise for the Prime Minister on several other Committees of which he is the chair.

I will be bringing Departments together to find solutions to improve the effectiveness of policy development across government. I will also be working with the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and other Departments across government to deliver the post-Kyoto environmental agenda, in particular ensuring that we deliver on our domestic environmental objectives.

The Prime Minister has also requested me to develop my role internationally, particularly in relation to China through my chairmanship of the China task force, and to take ministerial responsibility for the British-Irish Council, which I will chair in London on 2 June. The full text of the letter that I have received from the Prime Minister about my new role has been deposited in the Library.

Mr. Evennett: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that reply; Conservative Members certainly find it most interesting. What confidence can my constituents have in his policy co-ordination, given the disastrous mess he made of the cross-departmental Thames Gateway project? My constituents wonder how he can justify a full salary for his job.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I certainly reject what the hon. Gentleman says about the Thames Gateway. For the first time, we are seeing major housing, infrastructure and community development there. There have also been many developments in many other communities, and we have notified the House about them. I will be judged on the basis of my record, rather than the hon. Gentleman's rhetoric. As to my salary, I have already pointed out that I am doing far more than Lord Heseltine—[Interruption.] I thought the argument was that my salary should be cut simply because I am doing less work, yet no complaints were made about Lord Heseltine at the time. I am doing far more work than he did and fully justifying my salary. The Prime Minister has given me an important job to do and I am getting on with it.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): Renewal, neighbourhood renewal, regeneration and social housing have always been central to the Deputy Prime Minister's delivery in the House and the country. In his new role, may I ask whether he is still going to have a hands-on role in these areas? [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Deputy Prime Minister: It sounds like a sixth-form public school rally. Yes, I can tell my hon. Friend that we will continue to play an active part in those matters. One of the Cabinet Committees that I will be involved with is housing and planning, which is important in meeting the housing needs of this country. I noticed that there was a great deal of laughing about my proposal to—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to quieten down again. With all the noise in the Chamber, hon. Members are making the situation difficult for me as Speaker. I ask for the House's help and co-operation. [Interruption.] Order. We can do without the Minister for the Cabinet Office, the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), throwing in her tuppence worth.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I was happy to have been involved with a Department that doubled the resources going into housing and made a real contribution to improving our housing stock for more than 1.5 million people. Yesterday I attended the launch of the £60,000 house, which many people said could not be done. It is one of the best things that we have done, offering great opportunities for first-time buyers and the Government are responsible for it.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Among the many important jobs that the Deputy Prime Minister is going to continue to engage in, does he retain any responsibility for standards of conduct and propriety in local government?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That is the responsibility of the Department for Communities and Local Government.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Charities

5. Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's proposals for reform of charities law. [71283]

8. Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): What plans she has to meet the Charity Commission to discuss implementation of the Charities Bill. [71286]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): The Charities Bill has been widely welcomed for the way it improves and modernises charity law. It has completed its passage in the House of Lords and will return to the House as soon as parliamentary time allows. I will meet the chair and chief executive of the Charity Commission on Monday 22 May to discuss a number of matters of mutual interest, including the Charities Bill.

Mr. Scott: Will the Minister look further into the burden of VAT on charities as part of his work?

Edward Miliband: I know that the hon. Gentleman worked hard in the charities industry before entering the House, and he is a doughty fighter for charities in his own constituency. On the issue of irrecoverable VAT, it would cost £500 million to return all that VAT to charities. Two reviews have looked at the question of whether there is a way of doing so for some charities and not others, but they have not found a solution. The Government have done a huge amount of work on charities' tax position, and there has been a £400 million increase in the amount that they receive under Gift Aid since we introduced reforms. That is just one of the things that the Government are doing to help the charitable sector.

Mr. Walker: I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box, but what is he going to do about the awful practice of chugging? Basically, £8 of every £10 goes to organisations that put hired muggers on the street to make people part with their hard-earned cash in the belief that it will go to good charities when, in fact, it goes to the organisations that have won the contract.

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman asked a characteristically robust question. Everyone in the House wants to encourage charitable giving, including donations through face-to-face collections. The Charities Bill makes a difference, as it regulates the practice of collecting on the street through the Charity Commission and a system of licensing by local authorities.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I, too, welcome my hon. Friend to his new post—it is a well-deserved appointment. Does he agree it is a matter of concern that people who collect for charities in supermarkets, licensed premises and restaurants sometimes produce a badge that has not been registered with the Charity Commission? What steps are he and the Government taking to improve licensing?

Edward Miliband: I thank my hon. Friend, both for his welcome and for his question. The Charities Bill will make a difference to face-to-face and street collecting. It applies less to the small collections that everyone in the House welcomes than to collections in supermarkets and elsewhere, which will be regulated for the first time.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that in my real life before coming to the House I was chief executive of a registered social landlord? We were a registered charity, and were subject to regulation by no fewer than five organisations, including the slow-moving Charity Commission. Will he undertake to look at the over-regulation of registered social landlords so that we can make progress on the provision of more social housing, which the Government rightly support and promote?

Edward Miliband: I agree with my hon. Friend about the important role that housing associations and registered social landlords play in the supply of housing, and I promise to look at the issues that she raised. The Bill modernises the Charity Commission in several important ways. It will streamline the organisation and, I hope, help charities to deliver the services that we want them to deliver.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Climate Change

6. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What plans he has to visit Latin America to discuss the post-Kyoto climate change agenda. [71284]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): My hon. Friend may be aware that I have visited a number of Latin American countries over the past few years, and I have held discussions with the presidents of Brazil, Argentina and Mexico. I have also held discussions with the presidents of Venezuela and Colombia. Most notably, I held a number of meetings with President Cardoso of Brazil during the Kyoto negotiations. More recently, in March this year, I welcomed President Lula of Brazil during his state visit to the United Kingdom. I have an invitation to return to Brazil and I would of course be happy to visit, should my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister ask me to do so.

Mr. Blizzard: In his role representing the country internationally, may I encourage my right hon. Friend to visit more Latin American countries? Given our policies on common agricultural policy reform and fair trade, we are their best EU partner, but we need to follow through so that they are aware of that. Instead, President Chirac visits them, even though he spends a great deal of time trying to block the reforms that would benefit them.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I agree with a great deal of what my hon. Friend said. The House is well aware of the work that he has undertaken as the chair of the all-party groups on Latin America and Brazil, and I am particularly grateful for the advice that they have given me before my visits to Brazil and Latin America. Those countries will play a major part in the forthcoming global negotiations on trade, climate change and, indeed, the CAP. We will do all that we can—I am sure that the Prime Minister himself will do so—to work directly with their leaders to achieve the solutions that will be good not only for the country and Latin America but for the world economy.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Does not the Deputy Prime Minister think that when he meets the leaders of Latin American countries, they will treat him with the same degree of ridicule as does the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Greg Hands.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Ministerial Code

7. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): What her Department's role is in monitoring compliance with the ministerial code. [71285]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Hilary Armstrong): The ministerial code was reissued in July 2005, taking account of comments made by the Public Administration Committee and the Committee on Standards in Public Life. Section 1 of the ministerial code sets out Ministers' responsibilities in relation to the code.

Mr. Hands: The Government make provisions for the enforcement of standards and ethics at most levels of government, from parish councillors all the way up. Why is it that under the ministerial code, the only people not subject to independent outside scrutiny are Government Ministers?

Hilary Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman is a new Member of the House. He may not remember that under previous Administrations, there was no ministerial code. [Interruption.] There was no ministerial code, as such. There were questions about Ministers' behaviour, but they were not published and nobody knew what those questions were until 1992. In 1997 we published the ministerial code. As from 23 March, Sir John Bourn has been appointed the independent adviser on Ministers' interests. This, too, is an innovation, and Sir John will provide advice to Ministers and Permanent Secretaries on the handling of Ministers' private interests, as set out in section 5 of the ministerial code.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [71294] Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 17 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I list my engagements, I am sure the whole House will join me in sending our condolences to the families of Private Joseva Lewaicei and Private Adam Morris, who were killed in Iraq on Saturday. We owe them a great debt of gratitude and we pay tribute to their dedication and their courage in the service of their country.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Khabra: Does the Prime Minister agree that the Human Rights Act 1998 imposes an enormous duty on the state to protect its citizens against terrorism and crime? In the light of this clear duty, does he also agree that in making decisions in such cases, judges ought to be aware of the wider interests of the public, and that human rights lobbyists should have a better understanding of their role in society?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, but it is important to emphasise that because it incorporates the European convention on human rights, the Human Rights Act allows for a balance between the rights of the individual and the wider collective rights of society. If that balance is interpreted wrongly, we must look at that. It is always open to the House to decide that we will legislate, irrespective of the Human Rights Act. It is perfectly possible, both under the European convention and under the Human Rights Act, for that balance to be more sensible. Most people would agree, for example, that if someone is inciting hatred and inciting people to kill others in this country, it is absurd if we cannot return them to their own country.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): On behalf of the Opposition, may I add our sympathies to what the Prime Minister said about the soldiers who gave their lives in Iraq? Our thoughts should be with their families for what they have done on our behalf.

Two weeks ago the Prime Minister said that automatic deportation would apply to any foreign national

"convicted of an imprisonable offence".—[Official Report, 3 May 2006; Vol. 445, c. 960.]

Last week he said it would apply to those actually imprisoned. This week the Home Secretary said that automatic deportation would now apply only to foreign nationals serving a "significant" jail term. Which is it?

The Prime Minister: It is exactly as I explained when I first answered the right hon. Gentleman. It applies only to people who have gone to prison, which is why we are talking about foreign prisoners. If, for example, someone is sent to prison for a very short space of time and they have been in this country for a long period of time, then the presumption of automatic deportation would not apply, but in the vast bulk of cases, as has been explained, there will be an automatic presumption to deport, and the vast bulk of those people will, indeed, be deported. In my view, those people should be deported, irrespective of any claim that they have that the country to which they are returning may not be safe. That is why it is important that we consider legislating, if necessary, to ensure that such an automatic presumption applies.

Mr. Cameron: We have gone from "all prisoners" to "all significant prisoners", and now we have got the "vast bulk"—the Prime Minister is making it up as he goes along. That is an example of a Government in complete paralysis. Let me give him another example: he has said that the Human Rights Act 1998 has led to an abuse of common sense and that he will review it, and a few moments ago he said that perhaps the House of Commons will legislate. Three years ago, however, in January 2003, he announced a review of the operation of the Act—what happened to that review?

The Prime Minister: It was precisely because we believed it important to rebalance the system that we introduced, for example, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, which allowed us to take money off those suspected of being involved in drug dealing. It was for precisely that reason that we introduced the antisocial behaviour legislation. And it was for precisely that reason that we introduced the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which allowed us to impose mandatory minimum sentences on people carrying illegal firearms. What those things have in common is that the Conservative party either opposed them or refused to vote for them. Yes; we will make sure that our human rights legislation does not get in the way of commonsense legislation to protect our country. However, when we have tried to legislate to toughen up the law, the Liberal Democrats have opposed all the measures and the right hon. Gentleman has opposed most of them.

Mr. Cameron: We have been telling the Prime Minister about the problems with the Human Rights Act for years. He keeps announcing reviews, but nothing ever happens. I asked him about the 1998 Act, but he did not say a word about it, so let me give him another example of Government in paralysis. The head of the civil service has said that the immigration and nationality directorate has been "performing particularly well", yet the head of enforcement and removals at that directorate says that he has not got the faintest idea of how many people are in Britain illegally. When the head of enforcement and removals was asked how many illegal asylum seekers were not removed, he said that he did not know. When he was asked how many people have been told to leave the country by his department, he said that he simply could not say. Does the Prime Minister agree that after nine years in charge that is just unacceptable?

The Prime Minister:

"There are no official estimates of the number of illegal immigrants into the United Kingdom. By its very nature, illegal immigration is difficult to measure and any estimates would be highly speculative—[Official Report, 20 April 1995; Vol. 258, c. 328.]

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman is quoting Michael Howard.

The Prime Minister: Yes, exactly—Michael Howard. Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman about the current situation in our asylum system: the number of unfounded claims is down; since 1997, the number of asylum seekers is down; all asylum seekers are now fingerprinted and issued with identity cards; and there are now three times as many removals as there were in 1997.

The right hon. Gentleman is right that it is necessary to control illegal immigration better, and there are two things that we need to do. First, we need to introduce electronic borders, which we have introduced for some 26 routes and which we need to roll out across the entire country. Secondly, we need identity cards both for foreign nationals and for British nationals. If we want to track people coming in and out of our country and to know the identity of people who are here, then that is what we have to do. The truth is that the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to support any of that. His spokesman has said that there have been 43 Criminal Justice Acts and that not one of them has done anything to help. Let me say what is in those Acts, including the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which the right hon. Gentleman voted against: the early removal scheme that would allow foreign national prisoners to be deported at the halfway point in their sentence; tougher sentences for murder and sexual and violent crimes; measures to tackle jury-nobbling; allowing hearsay evidence in court; a five-year minimum custodial sentence for unauthorised possession of firearms; and everything to do with antisocial behaviour. So when we introduce the next load of measures to help to deal with this problem, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will support them.

Mr. Cameron: I can sum up the Prime Minister's performance in one word—rattled. If the problem is the system he has inherited rather than the Ministers he has put in place, why did he sack his Home Secretary last week? Whether it is deporting dangerous criminals, sorting out the mess of the Human Rights Act, or dealing with illegal immigration, this is a Government in paralysis. The Prime Minister made the criminal justice system a top priority, yet he said this week that it is the Department that is "most distant from what reasonable people want".

Why, after four Home Secretaries, 43 pieces of legislation, and nine years, should anyone believe that he is the right man to sort it out?

The Prime Minister: For the simple reason that, as I have just pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman in stating the facts on asylum and immigration and on the criminal justice legislation, there are changes that have made a real difference. But yes, I agree that we have to do much more. That is precisely why we need the new measures such as identity cards and border controls that allow us to do something about it.

If we are comparing records on crime, let me just say to the right hon. Gentleman that under this Government, according to the British crime survey, overall crime is down, domestic burglary and vehicle theft are down, and police numbers are at a record high. When he was in the Home Office and the Conservatives were in office, crime doubled. I do not say that we have got everything right—of course not; we have got to do far more. What I do say, however, is that every time the tough measures that the right hon. Gentleman goes out and tells the media he wants are introduced here, they are opposed by him and his party. Next time we introduce them, perhaps he will put his vote where his mouth is.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): A recent report on levels of disposable income showed that this Government's policies on tax and benefits are helping to boost the income of poorer households. In my constituency, that means up to £40 a week for two out of five pensioners and up to £50 a week extra for a third of working-age households with children. Although all work on equality is important, does my right hon. Friend agree that this work on reducing household income inequality is one of our most important goals?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. It is important, therefore, that we continue with the measures that have seen big rises of, I think, 25 per cent. in real terms in child benefit and in the working families tax credit, which has helped many families to get into work and ensured that they have a decent living income. Somewhere in the region of 2 million pensioners have been lifted out of acute hardship. That has been achieved by a combination of measures—helping with fuel poverty, as well as the pension credit. It is important to realise that, even though there are still too many people in our country living in poverty, the situation is a world away from where it was in 1997.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): May I associate myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of condolence and sympathy for those who have died and been injured in Iraq? May I ask the Prime Minister this: will British forces have been withdrawn from Iraq at the time when he leaves office?

The Prime Minister: British forces should remain in Iraq until the job is done. Incidentally, they are there in Iraq—this is important to emphasise—and have been there for three years with full United Nations authority and with the consent of the first-ever democratically elected Iraqi Government. They are doing a magnificent job there. We owe them a huge debt of gratitude. That country wants its democracy to work, and that is why it is important that they stay until the Iraqi forces are capable of engaging with their own security themselves.

Sir Menzies Campbell: By the time the Prime Minister leaves office, will Guantanamo Bay, which the Attorney-General has described as unacceptable, have been closed down?

The Prime Minister: It might not surprise the right hon. and learned Gentleman to learn that I am not personally responsible for closing Guantanamo Bay. I agree that it is an anomaly that should be closed; I have said that all along. However, it is important to recognise that in Iraq and Afghanistan we are fighting a battle against the same forces of terrorism that want to disrupt our way of life here and to kill people. This is a global struggle, and it is right that Britain stand firm with its allies in engaging in that struggle and defeating the enemies of democracy and freedom.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend might be aware of the recent decision by the Law Lords to limit the amount of compensation for workers suffering from asbestos-related diseases and to their families. That decision will be devastating for thousands of workers and families throughout the United Kingdom. Will my right hon. Friend, or the appropriate Minister, agree to meet a small delegation of like-minded colleagues to explore the options for dealing with this outrageous decision taken by people who do not live in the real world?

The Prime Minister: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, and I would be very happy to meet him and his delegation to discuss the matter.

Q2. [71295] Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Given that the Prime Minister has decided to bounce the country into building new nuclear power stations even before his sham of an energy review has reported, and before we have found any solution to the problem of disposing of historic, let alone new, nuclear waste, are the Scottish communities that figured in the last Nirex report now back in the frame as possible nuclear dumps? Will this be the Prime Minister's legacy to Scotland?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, we have to dispose of the existing nuclear waste in any event. However, if we are to address the energy security needs of the United Kingdom—including Scotland—we have to be prepared to take the necessary decisions to ensure that we do not end up entirely dependent on foreign imports of gas. That would not be sensible, in my view. I do not believe that nuclear power is the sole answer. Of course renewables are important, as are energy efficiency and carbon sequestration. All the measures that we are taking will assist us, but we have to debate very seriously whether we need to replace nuclear power stations to guarantee the future energy needs of this country; otherwise, we would be engaging in a collective dereliction of our duty.

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): I understand that my right hon. Friend is meeting a delegation from the hospice movement later today. Will he bear in mind the essential and excellent work done by the Treetops hospice in my constituency, run by the Donna Louise Trust? Perhaps he could find time in his busy schedule to meet representatives of that hospice, preferably in the hospice.

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to the work of the Treetops hospice in my hon. Friend's constituency. I also understand the concern across the hospice movement about the changes in relation to lottery funding and other issues. I am meeting people from the movement today, and I hope that the Government will be in a position to say what we can do to try to meet those concerns as soon as possible.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): In January, I asked the Prime Minister to consider setting interim targets to ensure that we met the goal of getting treatment to all sufferers of HIV/AIDS by 2010. At the time, he said that that would be difficult because other countries needed to take action as well. Will he confirm that the Government are now supporting the campaign to set interim targets? Now that we have domestic consensus on the issue, will he tell the House what progress is being made internationally?

The Prime Minister: The whole point is that this needs to be done on an international basis, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would accept. I think that there is to be a meeting at the United Nations shortly, and we need to try to agree how we should stage the delivery of as near as possible universal access to HIV/AIDS treatment by 2010. The whole purpose of what we are trying to do is to ensure not only that our money will help to deliver that target but that there is a co-ordinated effort right across the international community. Fortunately, the auspices for that are reasonably good.

Mr. Cameron: I welcome that reply, but the point is to try to set an interim target for 2008, to give us a better prospect of hitting the overall target in 2010. Does the Prime Minister agree that one of the real challenges is to help children with HIV, who need access to specialist paediatric drugs? At present, there is little demand for such drugs in the west, but there is a big demand in Africa. What steps is the Prime Minister going to take to talk to the drugs companies to ensure wider provision of these vital treatments?

The Prime Minister: Again, what we are trying to do is to get the right buy-in from the pharmaceutical and drug companies, which are prepared to work with us to try to make sure that the treatments are available as cheaply as possible. Over the next few years, we are contributing in the region of £1.5 billion to tackle AIDS, TB and malaria, which is a huge commitment from this country, and rightly so. If we can set staging posts for universal access by 2010, we will do that. The important thing, however, is that that be done on a collective basis. It is important, too, that we do not forget the other two components involved in helping Africa, which are decisions that will be taken this year: first, the 20,000 peacekeepers that we need to have trained by the end of the year, which will be dramatically important in places such as Sudan; and secondly, the World Trade Organisation deal. That development package is of essential importance to the future of Africa. The good thing that is happening now in the international community is that those issues are being considered together and not in isolation.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): One of my right hon. Friend's predecessors, Harold Wilson, was a great advocate of HP sauce, produced in Aston. The company was taken over last year by Heinz, which is now threatening the livelihood of 120 workers in Aston, Birmingham. In relation to the discussions that I am having with Heinz directors, will my right hon. Friend give a commitment to the House that he will provide the support that those workers need to ensure that those manufacturing jobs are retained, which the area deserves?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to the Heinz workers in my hon. Friend's constituency and in many others constituencies in the country. I will give any support that I can to my hon. Friend in his efforts to preserve their jobs.

Q3. [71296] Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): Given the universal opposition in Suffolk and elsewhere, including from the police authority and the police themselves, will the Prime Minister instruct his new Home Secretary to put a stop at once to the uncosted, unwelcome and completely undesirable regionalisation of our police force?

The Prime Minister: There must be a proper process of examination, I am afraid, to make sure that we get the most effective police services in our country. It is generally accepted that it is right to review the service boundaries for all the reasons that we know. As I have repeated often in the House, the reason for doing that arises from a report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary which said that it was necessary to conduct that review. However, I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will take account of the representations made to him.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): This morning, our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) are at the Vauxhall plant trying to persuade the owners to make the necessary investment in the company so that the next generation of Vauxhall Motors can be built in Ellesmere Port. Will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to make sure that the Government do everything that they can to help that process?

The Prime Minister: First, the announcement of the loss of jobs at Ellesmere Port is deeply disappointing. I commit the Government and the Northwest Regional Development Agency to work with the company and the trade unions to support those facing redundancy. As my hon. Friend rightly implies, the key campaign is to get the new Astra model built at Ellesmere Port. The Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry are at Ellesmere Port today, and I will seek an early opportunity to talk to GM's chief executive, Rick Wagoner, to put the case for Ellesmere Port and to offer any UK Government assistance that is appropriate. The work force there are magnificent, they do a great job, I know that they would be worthy of securing the new Astra model, and I very much hope that they do so.

Q4. [71297] Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): The Prime Minister says that our forces in Iraq are doing a wonderful job, and, of course, they are—we all acknowledge that. However, the Saddam Hussein regime was overthrown three years ago, yet the violence is getting worse all the time, even in the south of the country. Our forces are often the target of terrorist attacks, and the very presence of coalition forces is used by terrorists as an excuse for their appalling violence. Would not a timetable for an orderly withdrawal of coalition forces, say, over the next 12 months, force the Iraqi Government and Iraqi citizens to come to terms with this problem and take control of their own destiny?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman put his finger on it when he said that the presence of coalition forces was being used as an excuse by the terrorist groups. It is important to understand that the Iraqi Government which I hope will be formed in the next few days will be, for the first time, a genuine unity Government. In other words, they will include as part of a coalition across all the different groups in the country representatives of the Shi'a, Sunni and Kurdish people. If that Government are in place, obviously the whole of Iraq can take a more benign path and escape from its current difficulties.

The purpose of both the militia in the south of the country and those who are still fighting, along with the al-Qaeda people, in the centre and the north is to stop that democratic Government functioning. I think that we must work with the new Government once they have been formed. Of course it has always been our strategy to withdraw when the Iraqis wish us to do so—when they are capable of handling their security themselves. We need to sit down with the new Government once they have been formed, and work out how we can ensure that the rest of the build-up of the Iraqi forces takes place so that of course, in time, we can withdraw. That is the very purpose of what we are trying to do.

It is important to realise one thing, however. The purpose of these groups—who know perfectly well that our desire is not to stay there, but to leave once the job is done—is to prevent the country from securing a broad coalition of unity across all the groups so that Iraq can be governed properly. In my view, it is the Iraqi Government who are the key to determination of the timetable, not the terrorist groups.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I have to tell my right hon. Friend that many of my constituents who hear the clamour and speculation about his future are concerned about when it is time to move on. They want to know if and when they will be able to move on, and move out of inadequate accommodation into decent, affordable, quality homes in the Bedford area. Does my right hon. Friend recognise their concerns, and does he agree that increasing the availability and quantity of decent homes is one of the key and serious tasks of this Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is completely right. If I may say so, that is another example of the decisions that must be made for the long-term future of the country. It is really no use people complaining about the affordability of housing in the south if they then say that no new homes should be built and there should be no development. That development will happen in a planned way, but it would be of great assistance, frankly, if the opposition parties agreed that we will have to build more homes in the south if we are to relieve the pressure on housing and allow families—particularly younger families—to get their feet on the first rungs of the housing ladder.

If we add that to the measures that encourage brownfield development, the affordable house—the £60,000 house launched by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister—and other measures such as shared equity, and put all those measures together in a proper package, we shall be able to deal with the problem. But we must be prepared to make the tough decision to say that we will need to build homes in the south.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Prime Minister will be aware that the Assembly met on Monday. He may not be aware that at that meeting, every Member of the Assembly stood for one minute's silence in memory of the young Ballymena man, Michael McIlveen, who has been grievously murdered. Today his family are laying his body to rest, and I suggest that our thoughts and prayers should be with them.

Does the Prime Minister know that there is a strange significance to this particular murder? Those who are charged cross the religious divide: they are Protestants and Roman Catholics. That seems to me a very strange thing. I feel that the Prime Minister should help the police at this time. The chief of police in Ballymena has made a statement saying that the situation may change, and that Protestants could be attacked in the same way. In order to prevent any retaliation, will the Prime Minister back the police by giving them the men who are needed to do the job, which is a very difficult job to do?

The Prime Minister: First, I endorse what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and join him in sending our condolences to the family of the young boy who was murdered. I also thank him for the responsible way in which he personally has handled the issue. It is very significant that there was a minute's silence that stretched right across the community in the Assembly. Yes, I will certainly give the police every support in the work that they do.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): Further to that reply, on reading the messages left at the McIlveen family home and at the scene of the attack, I was struck by the fact that young people were not only sharing their grief and shock, but were desperate also to share hope. The sight of so many young people in Celtic and Rangers jerseys emblazoned with Michael's nickname has been a great comfort to his family. Should it not also be a spur to all politicians and an inspiration to older generations, who have tolerated, excused or indulged sectarianism for too long?

The Prime Minister: I agree totally with what my hon. Friend says; he is absolutely right. Of course, the very best and most significant thing that could be done to demonstrate that people are working across the communities is if we can get devolved government back up and working again in Northern Ireland, with everybody committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. What my hon. Friend is saying is the future of Northern Ireland; what that appalling murder represents is, hopefully, the past.

Q5. [71298] Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to reassure his Labour colleagues that it will be he who will lead the Scottish election campaign next year, and from the front; that it will be his face that will appear on all the literature; and that he will take full advantage of his personal popularity to put the case for new nuclear build? If he does that, he will have my overwhelming support and that of my hon. Friends.

The Prime Minister: It is very kind of the hon. Gentleman to give me that ringing endorsement. One thing that I and my colleagues will be pointing out is that, as I understand it, the Scottish National party manifesto for the Scottish Parliament says that it would introduce an independence Bill in the first 100 days. Is that right?

Pete Wishart indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: Well, we will certainly be making a very great deal of that between now and the Scottish elections.

Water Shortages

12.32 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs an urgent question on water shortages. [Interruption.]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Ian Pearson) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members leave the Chamber quietly? The business of the House still continues.

Ian Pearson: The UK has seen below average rainfall for 19 months. In particular, the south-east has been much drier than during the notable drought of1974 to 1976. The Environment Agency believes that the drought in the south-east has the potential to be the worst for 100 years. Water planning is based on the principle that each water company has a water resource plan looking ahead 25 years. Water companies also have a drought plan setting out how they will continue to meet their duties during a water shortage.

I recognise the public concern about leakage rates. Ofwat, the economic regulator, sets targets for leakage and over the past 10 years, leakage rates have reduced by 30 per cent. However, there is more to be done, particularly by some companies. Since privatisation, water companies have invested £55 billion in water and sewerage assets, and more than £3.5 billion in 2004-05 alone.

As the House will be aware, water companies in the south-east have introduced hosepipe and sprinkler bans to manage the drought situation. The recent decision to approve the Sutton and East Surrey Water drought order application is the next step beyond a hosepipe ban. I am considering the independent inspector's reports following the hearings on the drought order applications made by Southern Water and Mid Kent Water.

Mr. Ainsworth: May I begin by congratulating the hon. Gentleman on his new post and by thanking him for that statement? The Opposition do not blame the Government for the weather, even though some of my colleagues would like us to. Many of us will remember the last Labour Minister for drought, who rapidly became the Minister for floods, so we accept that these things are indeed unpredictable, and we recognise that most of the water supply problems that we face, particularly in the south-east, are mainly the result of below average winter rainfall.

However, I remind the Minister of a statement that the Labour party made before the 1997 general election:

"Labour is determined to see significant improvements in the way the water industry serves local people, contributes to its communities and looks after the environment."

Nine years on, that looks like another failed ambition. Many people are bemused and angered by the fact that in Britain in the 21st century they face restrictions on their water use and the threat of standpipes.

Does the Minister agree that the task of urging people to use water wisely is not helped by the fact that the water industry loses more than 3.5 billion litres of water a day in leaks? Is he completely satisfied that all water companies are addressing the pressing issue of renewing our water supply infrastructure with the sense of urgency and the use of technology that people have a right to expect? Does he accept that it is reasonable for people to ask why they should do their bit, if the water companies do not seem to be doing theirs? Is he satisfied that a sufficiently robust sanctions regime is in place to prevent and control leaks, especially given that Thames Water has missed its target for fixing leaks for five years in a row now?

Does the Minister agree with Ken Livingstone, who yesterday said that compulsory metering was "inevitable"? If so, over what time frame does he think that those meters should be introduced? How does he square that with the statement made before the 1997 general election that "Labour is opposed to forcing people to install water meters"?

Is that still Labour policy? If not, and the Government are considering compulsory water metering, what measures is he considering to ensure that poorer families and vulnerable groups are not penalised by a compulsory metering regime?

What is the Government's policy on the construction of new reservoirs in the south-east? Is it not the height of folly, and seriously irresponsible, for the Government to press ahead with plans for millions of new homes in the south-east, an area already suffering from water stress, without having first put in place the infrastructure to support them? We all accept the need for more affordable housing, but nobody—least of all the people who would move into the new homes—would thank the Government if they were subjected to regular restrictions on their water use. Will the Government therefore support the Bill introduced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), which would require an assessment of the adequacy of water supplies to be made before the construction of new homes or commercial developments?

What plans do the Government have in place to ensure that supply matches demand, if we have another dry winter next year? Do the Government have any plans in that regard? What action do the Government have in mind to support those businesses that are likely to suffer from the consequences of drought orders? What assessment has the Minister made of the number of businesses that may face closure as a result of the restrictions he has sanctioned? What discussions has he had with major sporting venues, such as Wimbledon, Lords, race courses and golf courses about the likely impact on them of the imposition of drought orders?

We do not blame the Government for the weather, but we and the public will certainly hold them to account if they fail to take all action necessary to avert the worst effects of water shortage this year and in the future.

Ian Pearson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his words of welcome. I do indeed follow an illustrious predecessor in Denis Howell, who was the Member of Parliament for Small Heath. I am also responsible for floods, and if I am as successful in encouraging rainfall as he was, I will be delighted.

[Ian Pearson]

I welcome the realism shown by the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth). The situation is principally the result of below average rainfall for 19 months, so groundwater levels are very low. Although reservoir levels in the south-east are not that bad, more than 70 per cent. of the area's water comes from groundwater, and the Environment Agency's recent report shows those levels to be very low.

The Government recognise that there are too many leaks and we also believe that some water companies need to up their game. However, Sutton and East Surrey Water has met its leakage targets and the headline figures for 2004-05 show a reduction in leakage rates from 2003-04. All but three water companies met their leakage targets.

I note what the hon. Gentleman said about compulsory metering, which is not Government policy but which clearly has environmental benefits. The evidence suggests that it reduces domestic consumption by about 10 per cent., so it is worth serious consideration. All of us have to do our bit, water companies and consumers in the south-east alike. We need to think about the simple things, such as ensuring that the tap is turned off when we brush out teeth and that washing machines are fully loaded. Collectively, simple measures like that can have a major effect.

The hon. Gentleman asked about new reservoirs. He will know that five new reservoirs are planned for the south-east, and that three others in the area are to be expanded. The region's particular geography means that, traditionally, it has relied on groundwater far more than other parts of the UK. Reservoirs can be part of the solution in the south-east, but they will never be the whole solution and especially not in the short term, as of course the normal planning procedures apply. That is why we have drought orders.

The hon. Gentleman raised an important point to do with new housing developments in the south-east, and I shall explain how the system works. Water companies produce 25-year water resource plans that take account of future housing need, where that is clearly defined, and I am informed that the plans currently take account of 900,000 extra houses in the south-east. The regulator has to agree investment plans with the individual companies, based on the water resource forecasts. Those investment plans have been agreed up to 2010, but the next review of water prices and investment plans begins in 2009 and will take account of all housing development planned up to that year.

Lastly, the hon. Gentleman asked various questions about the impact on businesses and sporting venues. I emphasise that so far we have granted one drought order, and we expect the company concerned to implement it proportionately and sensitively. We do not know how long the present situation will last, but it is in everyone's interest to take action now. If there is a message to people in the south-east, it is that they should use water wisely in the current circumstances.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): This year, water and sewerage charges are up 5.5 per cent on last year. The Minister was reluctant to name poor performers, but will he have discussions with Ofwat about the performance of Thames Water, and of Severn Trent Water, the company that serves his constituency? Will he ensure that customers, who are paying substantially more this year, get a decent and improved service?

Ian Pearson: I shall certainly meet the regulator regularly, as it is important to ensure that customers get a fair a deal. That is what Ofwat is about. The fact that Thames Water has consistently missed its leakage targets for a long time is a serious problem that I intend to discuss with the company and the regulator.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): As the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) has already said, this is a weather issue so the Opposition would be ill-advised to hold the Government solely account for that. As the Minister said, there have been many months—he said 19; my information was 17—of below average rainfall in the south-east. Has he reached an assessment of whether that involves a change in the trend or is it in the normal run of weather events? The Department is responsible for assessing the impact of climate change, so in the light of possible climate change and of what appears to be a recurring pattern of extremely dry summers in the south-east, is it time to reassess the five extra reservoirs already planned for the area?

The hon. Member for East Surrey quoted from the Labour manifesto of 1997. Is the Minister happy that Ofwat has required adequate investment? In some companies, for example Southern Water, leakage is still running at 27 per cent. after nine years. That is unacceptable and requires rather greater urgency from the Government and the companies than seems so far to have been exhibited.

As many as 20 years ago plans for a national water grid were mooted. Are they being reconsidered in the context of current drought orders, hosepipe bans and water shortages? We know that water metering has a clear impact in reducing use. Not only has Ken Livingstone backed water metering, as the hon. Member for East Surrey mentioned, but a possibly even more authoritative body, the Consumer Council for Water, has backed compulsory metering in affected parts of the south-east. Will the Government consider, not a general plan for metering, but at least a plan for metering in affected areas?

The Minister mentioned the Government's commitment to extra house building in the south-east: 580,000 houses over the next 20 years. Is not it time to recognise that the infrastructural needs of that housing have not been put in place ahead of the new build? We have had new build and we are still suffering not merely water shortages but considerable problems with drainage and sewerage, which are another aspect of the water companies' responsibilities. Will the Minister tell us whether the Department will seriously consider putting a block on development in the most affected areas until it is clear that the infrastructure is in place? Finally, does the Minister agree with the Mayor of London's turning down a planning request for a desalination plant that would ease some of the difficulties in the area?

Ian Pearson: On climate change, I am informed by experts that droughts tend to go in cycles, but I do not think anybody knows what the full impact of climate change is likely to be on our environment and whether we are likely to see more sudden occurrences of drought or floods. We need to keep the situation under close review.

In the planning framework, water resource plans are based on looking at the worst drought scenario in 1993-94 and assuming that, with hosepipe and non-essential usage bans, a month's supply would be left. That equates to a one in a hundred years occurrence. Unfortunately, it seems that there is a prospect of such an occurrence this summer. We all hope that that will not be the case but we cannot guarantee it.

I have already answered the questions about leakage and metering, but I emphasise that more can be done about leakages. There is an economic leakage rate, but it is important that we set leakage targets and that they are met by water companies. Where they are not met we want to know why and, ultimately, the regulator will use the powers at his discretion.

There has been an increase in metering, which covers about 27 per cent. of the total household population. It has been rising in recent years and I expect that trend to continue, but we should not force meters on people—certainly not unless there is a water scarcity. There are clear environmental benefits from introducing water metering, and we as a Government need to look at how those benefits can be realised.

I have already commented on the infrastructure needs of housing development in the south-east. I believe that that is being taken into account in the 25-year planning process, but I will undertake to look into that again, just to ensure that I am personally assured that those plans adequately reflect new-build commitments. It is important we are joined up as a Government, and I will endeavour to ensure that that happens.

Lastly, the idea of a national water grid has been bandied around for at least 40 years. It is not a very environmentally friendly measure, given that water is a pretty bulky supply and the energy requirements needed to pump water around parts of the country, let alone the excavation costs that would be required, make its use prohibitive and a non-starter, but the idea resurfaces from time to time. I do not get any sense that water companies are planning on that basis, but they have done some significant work over the past 10 years to improve regional grids, so that they can co-operate and share scarce water resources, which has been very beneficial.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): My constituency is not only subject to a hosepipe ban but is in the process of being subjected to compulsory water metering, so why will the Minister not recognise the facts and accept that the Labour party has now abandoned the pledge in respect of compulsory water metering that it gave prior to the 1997 election? Does he agree that more needs to be done to help those who are least well off to meet their water charges, particularly under a metering regime, both by introducing additional measures and by giving greater publicity to the water efficiency measures that are already in place?

Ian Pearson: I am certainly very aware of the fact that there is compulsory metering in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency, because of the water scarcity there. Certainly, the water company believes that that is a win-win situation for the consumer: less water will be used overall, because people will be more careful in monitoring their water usage, and that will reduce customers' bills in turn as well. That is one way in which water can be more affordable, but a range of Government support measures are available at the moment, and we certainly want to ensure that he encourages his constituents to take advantage of them.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Could the Minister confirm that new house building accounts for only 1 per cent. of the housing stock and that, although we need to ensure that new houses are water efficient, it is much more effective to concentrate on the existing housing stock and to encourage its increased water efficiency? Will he look again at measures to encourage people to upgrade the water efficiency of their houses? Does he agree that it is perfectly possible to meet housing need in the south-east and still respect the need to improve water efficiency?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. It is absolutely right to say that the vast majority of the housing stock for 2030 is already in place in the United Kingdom and that new-build plans account for only a tiny fraction of the potential additional water usage in the future. We need to focus on water efficiency in households, just as we need to focus more on energy efficiency. There is a range of ways in which consumers can use water more wisely—for example, with dual-flush toilets. The simple fact is that new house development will be far more water and energy-efficient than the current housing stock. The more that we can do to bring the current housing stock up to the best environmental standards for both health and water efficiency reasons, the better for all concerned.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Even so, does the Minister accept that my constituents will find it inconceivable that the water companies can cope with the huge number of extra houses being foisted on the south-east when they cannot cope at all with the current drought? No one will believe him.

Ian Pearson: In that case, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman can explain the situation better to his constituents, because there is a clear difference between a short-term drought and the long-term planning of water resources. We need to ensure that that long-term planning is effective and takes account of new housing development, but we also need to consider water saving measures as well and to use water wisely. His constituents need to use water wisely, but they need not be afraid that new housing development will cause them massive water problems in the future, because I am confident that the planning system can fully take into account future housing needs.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend to his new post.

Reports suggest that leakages in Britain are among the worst in Europe, and perhaps only two countries, one of which is Bulgaria, have a worse record. Is that not simply a consequence of a failure to invest by the water industry over a long period? Is it not a direct consequence of the Tories' privatisation of the water sector? Have not the private companies been simply sweating—I use that word advisedly—the assets built up over generations of public investment before they were privatised? Is it not time that the state again took a direct role in water supply, to guarantee sufficient and secure water provision for the future?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend and I must agree to disagree on some of that, but we do agree that there have been decades of under-investment in the water industry, stemming back way before privatisation, because the public sector was not that good at investing in long-term infrastructure in the water industry. One of the problems with the public sector is that there are always more pressing investment needs—whether schools or hospitals—than long-term improvements to sewerage pipes and the water supply. The simple fact is that, since privatisation, there has been £55 billion-worth of investment, primarily funded by the water companies, which has led to a major improvement. Most of the water companies have made significant reductions in leakage rates. More can be done, but we must still face the fact that we were one of the first countries in the world to introduce water and sewerage systems, so our system is older than anyone else's and it is still in need of repair and further investment, which will come from the water companies as part of their future investment plans.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): Could the Minister confirm that he said that, if the current weather pattern continues, London and the south-east face standpipes in 100 days? In those circumstances, can he tell us what discussions he is already having with the water companies about ensuring that the vulnerable have access to water and that those people who live in the 24-hour economy can get water from standpipes whenever they need it?

Ian Pearson: No, I cannot confirm what the hon. Lady says, but I can quote the best assessment available from the Environment Agency:

> "An exceptionally hot and dry summer like 1976 would give extremely low reservoir levels by the autumn, with a risk of standpipes in London. It should be possible for Thames Water to avoid standpipes, but much depends on the effectiveness of demand management measures".

That is the situation at the moment. We do not know what the weather patterns will be over the next few months. The Met Office forecasts pretty much average rainfall for this summer, but if we get a summer like 1976, there are likely to be difficulties. However, it would be unwise to say that we will have standpipes in a certain number of days, because that simply is not the case judged from where we stand today.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Does the Minister accept that there is widespread concern in my constituency, which is bang in the middle of the Sutton and East Surrey Water catchment area, over the imposition of a drought order? He says that he has asked the company to apply the order sensitively. Will he explain how one applies a drought order sensitively? Does he not accept that if, say, a car wash is still allowed to operate, people who drive past it will say, "Well, if that's operating, why on earth should I cut down on my consumption at home?"?

Ian Pearson: I appreciate the difficulties that some of the hon. Gentleman's constituents may face as a result of the drought order. That is why I looked very carefully at the inspectors' report, talked to the Environment Agency and had a conversation with the company last week to convince myself that the order was absolutely necessary. I am afraid that it is. If we are to protect essential supplies to consumers, and particularly to vulnerable consumers, we need to allow the company to take action. However, we need to be clear—I have been clear in what I have said to the company—that we want to see the maximum water saving for the minimum impact on the consumer. That has got to be the objective and I am sure that that is how the company will want to apply the order in these circumstances.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I should declare an interest as a Sutton and East Surrey consumer. Does the Minister believe that customers should benefit from a discount in their Bills for the reduction in service?

Ian Pearson: No, I am afraid that I do not. Our water system is based specifically on ensuring that we have long-term plans, but those are not long-term plans to prevent there ever being a water shortage. Arranging for there never to be a water shortage would require such a huge capital investment that people's water bills would be enormous. We have to expect water shortages because of adverse weather conditions in certain circumstances. I am afraid that, although the situation is difficult for consumers who cannot water their gardens and who are being encouraged to be more water-efficient, it is right that they should look to take those measures and they should not really expect to see a reduction in their Bills as a result.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Exactly five years ago—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will decide when the statement finishes. The Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) should not get impatient. The one thing that you need in Parliament is patience.

Mr. Hands: Exactly five years ago, TV images of the foot and mouth crisis had a negative impact on tourism in this country. If TV images of standpipes and people approaching them with buckets were to be beamed across the world, the likely effect on visitors to this country could be dire. What meetings has the Minister had with representatives of London and south-east tourism, and the conference and hotel industry in recent days?

Ian Pearson: I have not had any specific meetings with the tourism industry in London. I have been rather focused on other matters. In granting a drought order—other orders that have gone through the inspectors' inquiries are under consideration in the south-east—we are trying to take early action to prevent the possibility of having to use standpipes in the future if the drought conditions persist. It is surely right to take early, prompt action now. The message to consumers in the south-east to use water responsibly could make sure that we do not need to take more extreme measures at a later date.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): South-West Bedfordshire, which currently has water restrictions, is due to have the largest number of houses built in it out of anywhere in the south-east. Anglian Water has told me—contrary to what the Minister has just said to the House—that funding for local water infrastructure will come only in 2010, but the new houses will be being built from 2009 onwards. Anglian Water needs to know that information now. Is that not a failure of joined-up government?

Ian Pearson: I take the hon. Gentleman's point seriously. My understanding of the situation is that the regulator has agreed investment plans with water companies up to 2010 at the moment. There are long-term water resource plans that go to 2030. Funding for 2010 onwards will be taken into account during the next price review. However, I undertake to look into the situation. I get the sense that the House has some concerns about whether planning is being effectively addressed in water resource plans. If I can make any further information available to comfort the House on this matter, I will certainly want to do so.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I welcome the Minister's late conversion to the benefits of privatisation, but my constituents and their gardens are going to be thirsty if they have to wait for action until a price review in 2009. He said, quite rightly, that consumers can do much to save water themselves. So, why is it that, on a water company's website, I can buy a large plastic tub with a lid on the top and a hole in the bottom, called a composter, at the heavily subsidised rate of £8.99, but on the same website a plastic tub with a lid on the top and a tap on the bottom, called a water butt, costs £34.99? Surely we should be doing more to promote the subsidised use of water butts in the current drought situation. The water companies claim that there is a national shortage of water butts. Can we get our priorities right and make sure that my constituents who want to save water have the means to do it at an affordable rate?

Ian Pearson: I have not seen the website that the hon. Gentleman referred to, but I am certainly aware that water butts in the south-east have been in short supply for a considerable time. The key message is that people need to save water and to use water sensibly. If that happens, I am sure that we can avoid the need for more extreme measures. Nobody wants to see standpipes in the streets. That is the purpose of the water order for Sutton and East Surrey. We will continue to look at further applications from water companies. As I said, the order of the day is early action now, more work on leakage from the companies, and more attention from consumers to the need to save water.

European Communities (Deregulation)

1.7 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision in respect of the effect on persons and businesses of regulations made under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972.

I declare my interest in the Register of Members' Interests. One of the constantly recurring complaints from British business concerns EU regulations. Of course, most businesses greatly resent the very existence of many of those regulations, but most of all they condemn the peculiar British habit of gold-plating EU directives. Her Majesty's Government transpose the directives into our law so that they end up being tougher, more complicated and less business-friendly than elsewhere in the EU. The other big complaint is the open-ended lifespan of many of the directives. Time and again, business tells Members that what was relevant 10 years ago is now often out of date, yet the directives remain in place, so why not time limit the directives with sunset clauses?

That is why my Bill has two key aims: first, to outlaw gold-plating by giving businesses and individuals the right to launch a challenge in the courts, and, secondly, to ensure that directives can be challenged if they do not contain a sunset clause. I pay tribute to the entrepreneur, Sir Paul Judge, who has put a great deal of effort and work into the Bill, and also to my hon. Friends the Members for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) and for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), who introduced similar Bills in the last Parliament.

In a few minutes, I will outline to the House some further details about the Bill, but I just want to say a word or two about the current context that business is facing. Anyone listening to the Chancellor's recent Budget statement would have heard an upbeat assessment of UK plc. We heard a great deal about inflation, growth, interest rates and employment. However, whatever the Chancellor said in his Budget statement, dark storm clouds are gathering over the UK economy. The recent trade figures were atrocious. Indeed, trade in goods showed a quarterly deficit of £18.9 billion, which was the worst since records began in 1697. I am struggling to remember who was on the throne in 1697, although I sure that my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) will know—was it William of Orange? That was a long time ago and the figures are disgraceful.

Our competitive position is under threat. Indeed, in the World Economic Forum's competitiveness league tables, the UK has fallen from fourth in 1998 to 13th today. According to the CBI, we are experiencing the lowest level of business investment since records began. Spending on research and development is falling and there is a skills crisis, with 5 million people having no qualifications at all.

The phenomenon of falling productivity growth is one of the key reasons behind our worsening competitive position. Our productivity grew at an annual average rate of 2.5 per cent. between 1992 and 1997, but has now slowed to 1.6 per cent. over the past six years, which is in line with the rate in the eurozone, but way below that of America and many other economies.

One of the main drivers for the dark set of clouds that is gathering is excessive regulation. Indeed, the British Chambers of Commerce has a burdens barometer. When I last looked at it, the combined total cost of regulation since 1997, excluding the minimum wage, came to £50.27 billion. Much of that regulation comes from the EU. Indeed, Her Majesty's Government's Better Regulation Task Force estimated that the EU was responsible for roughly 40 per cent. of all regulations affecting business. The relentless tide of EU regulations is getting worse, and despite what the Chancellor says and despite the Lisbon agenda, the situation is bleak.

I entirely accept that there are other drivers of regulation that affects business, including the Government's policy agenda. We have administrative creep in this country and government is growing larger by the week and the compensation culture is exploding. However, the biggest driver of all is gold-plating, although it is the most avoidable of all, too. As I mentioned briefly, gold-plating occurs when implementation in this country goes beyond the minimum necessary to comply with an EU directive. It can involve extending the scope of a directive by adding to its substantive requirements, or substituting wider UK legal terms for those in the directive. It can involve not taking advantage of derogations, or providing for sanctions, enforcement mechanisms and matters that go beyond the minimum needed, such as the burden of proof. Such things happen time and time again.

Let me give two quick examples. The Government implemented the EU part-time workers directive through the Part-time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000. The EU directive stated that part-time workers must have the same rights as full-time workers, but left member states to decide how to implement the requirement. The UK regulations include a provision that UK firms must issue part-time workers who query their terms and conditions with a written statement setting out all reasons within 14 days. The British Chambers of Commerce argued that that was a classic example of gold-plating.

A further such example was discussed the other day. The artists' resale rights directive or, to give its French title, the droit de suite regulations, give living artists—it will eventually cover dead artists as well—a right to a percentage of revenue when their works are sold. The British Government said that they would oppose it, but unfortunately, the regulations got into the hands of an especially weak Department of Trade and Industry Minister in another place. The Minister spectacularly over-regulated, and instead of implementing the directive to the letter and sticking to what it strictly required, he ensured that the threshold for a work of art was not €3,000, but €1,000, thus drawing into the net huge numbers of extra businesses and items and completely contradicting the Prime Minister's and the Government's earlier campaign in Brussels to try to get the directive rejected.

Such gold-plating happens all the time, so what can be done about it? A Bill could be introduced to challenge gold-plating itself. My Bill would achieve that by introducing a right for businesses, individuals and public bodies to seek a declaration by the courts that UK regulations enacted under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 were ineffective to the extent that their provisions went beyond the basic minimum requirement under Community law. That would apply if the UK regulations contained extra and burdensome clauses beyond the requirements of Community law. Secondly, it would apply if other member states had not implemented certain provisions, and, thirdly, if other member states had implemented such provisions in a less burdensome way. Additionally, and importantly, similar legal challenges could be made under the Bill if the EU directive did not contain a sunset clause or specific cut-off date.

My Bill would force policy makers and civil servants to monitor closely what was happening in other member states. Above all else, it would help to change the whole culture of Whitehall and make that much more business-friendly. Rather than the UK habitually being the toughest and most pedantic implementer of EU regulations, we would thus actually move at the pace of the most dynamic and least regulated UK economy. That explains why the Bill is needed. It is not some back-of-an-envelope, here-today-gone-tomorrow, kite-flying ten-minute Bill, but a measure that is vital to the health and future of UK businesses.

The Bill has third-party endorsement. The Federation of Small Businesses says:

"This constructive Bill carries the support of the Federation of Small Businesses."

The Bill has the support of the British Chambers of Commerce, which says:

"The BCC believes that the measures contained in this Bill will go some way towards improving the regulatory culture in the UK".

It has the support of the Forum of Private Business, which says:

"This Bill will allow gold-plated regulations to be challenged and overturned ... This is fantastic news for smaller businesses".

The Bill also has all-party support and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Henry Bellingham, Sir Malcolm Rifkind, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Adam Afriyie, Mr. Edward Davey, Mr. Philip Dunne, Mr. Mark Field, Mr. Nick Hurd, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Shailesh Vara, Angela Watkinson and Mr. Tim Yeo.

European Communities (Deregulation)

Mr. Henry Bellingham accordingly presented a Bill to make provision in respect of the effect on persons and businesses of regulations made under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 October, and to be printed [Bill 183].

Orders of the Day

Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill

As amended in the Committee and the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

'(1) A public authority must, in exercising its functions, act in the way it considers best calculated to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development in Northern Ireland, except to the extent that it considers that any such action is not reasonably practicable in all the circumstances of the case.

(2) For this purpose—

(a) a public authority must have regard to any strategy or guidance relating to sustainable development issued by the Department of the Environment, and

(b) a public authority other than a Northern Ireland department must have regard to any guidance relating to sustainable development issued by a Northern Ireland department other than the Department of the Environment.

(3) In this section "public authority" means—

(a) a Northern Ireland department,

(b) a district council in Northern Ireland, and

(c) any other person designated for the purposes of this section by order made by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

(4) The power to make an order under subsection (3)(c) is exercisable by statutory rule for the purposes of the Statutory Rules (Northern Ireland) Order 1979 (S.I. 1979/1573 (N.I. 12)).

(5) Such an order may not be made unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, the Northern Ireland Assembly.'. —[Mr. Hanson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.18 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 1.

Mr. Hanson: I hope that the new clause and amendment will find favour in the House because they will establish a statutory duty for sustainable development on public authorities in Northern Ireland. They will ensure that public authorities act in a manner that best contributes to the objectives of sustainable development. You may be aware, Mr. Speaker, that on 9 May my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched the Northern Ireland sustainable development strategy, which in itself establishes a framework and focus for tackling the challenges that lie ahead on sustainable development and environmental protection, to provide a better future for future generations in Northern Ireland.

It is self-evident that global warming is a continuing problem, and the Government and the people of Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom need to support measures that tackle the problem and make our communities more sustainable. There are certainly measures that we can take which will help to achieve those objectives and aims. Without a doubt, we need to look not only at our own lives, but at our public bodies and institutions to see how we can deliver a strategy to help us make more responsible choices on sustainable development. We need to take account of long-term sustainability. The Government are committed to that, and we need to ensure that we take a lead on that in government so that we meet sustainable objectives and set a framework to encourage others, particularly public bodies, to do so as well.

The new clause gives a power to the Secretary of State to put a statutory duty on public authorities. It sends a strong signal from the Government that we are serious about tackling global warming, encouraging sustainable development and making those objectives a reality, not just in government, but in other public bodies in Northern Ireland. The policy will allow for the transfer from the Department of the Environment to the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister the ability to set sustainable targets. I shortly expect to consult further on what those targets and objectives should be.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): The Minister will be well aware that, in his home nation of Wales, the National Assembly has a statutory duty to promote sustainable development. Given that he has referred to the First Minister and Deputy First Minister of the Northern Ireland Assembly having the power to designate other public authorities, and in the light of his good wishes for the re-establishment—one hopes—of the real Northern Ireland Assembly, why is there no provision for the Assembly to have the duty that there is in Wales to promote sustainable development?

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Lady is accurate. The National Assembly for Wales has a statutory duty on that basis. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has shown, from the Government's perspective, that we wish to promote sustainable development. Subsection (3) allows for "public authority" to mean

"any other person designated for the purposes of this section by order made by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister."

The Northern Ireland Assembly can consider that. The Government have tried to set down objectives for local authorities and other public bodies. We have left open the opportunity for other persons to be designated. If the Assembly wants to have a statutory authority, it can examine those matters and discuss them with the Northern Ireland team.

I commend the new clause and hope that it receives the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): I offer a broad welcome to the new clause. There is strong support in the community for the active commitment that the Secretary of State in particular is showing to moving the sustainable development agenda forward. It is clear that the new clause spins out of the sustainable development strategy launched last week. The Government are moving quickly to translate their commitments into legislation. That is welcome. I note that that contrasts with the Government's long-standing commitment to consider issues such as the powers of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. They are still reluctant to address such things in the Bill, yet something new can quickly spin into it. Perhaps the Minister will address that.

Some of the details could be fine-tuned, in particular when it comes to putting things into practice. Hon. Members might know from what I have said before that I am not sure that putting sustainable development and its co-ordination into the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister is the best way of ensuring that the necessary co-ordination takes place. There is already a clutter of responsibilities in that Department that are not easy to manage in terms of co-ordination and liaison. This could add to the difficulties.

My experience of the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister working with other Departments is that things can be cross-cutting, but they do not achieve the benefits of cross-cutting co-ordination. I hope that there is enough room for us to revisit that so that the Assembly and a restored Executive can make the best, most competent and most appropriate provisions for a rigorous approach to sustainable development by Government and non-governmental bodies.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I agree with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan). Generally speaking, the new clause is uncontentious and will be broadly welcomed, but I want to tease out some details.

Sustainable development is new to the Bill and was not discussed on Second Reading or in Committee. One of the difficulties of a miscellaneous provisions Bill is that we might have to deal with things that come almost out of nowhere and at any stage, whether it is in Committee or on Report. Nevertheless, sustainable development and the aims for public authorities are laudable.

Subsection (1) states:

"A public authority must, in exercising its functions, act in the way it considers best calculated to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development...except to the extent"

this is what concerns me—

"that it considers that any such action is not reasonably practicable in all the circumstances of the case."

As we know, a get-out clause is always written in for such matters. What examples does the Minister have in mind? What circumstances could a public authority use as a means of avoiding action that it might otherwise take?

Mr. Hanson: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. The new clause is a framework clause to give the Secretary of State the power to set guidance for local authorities. It is the intention of the Secretary of State, via the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and myself, as the Minister responsible, to consult on a range of things to do with the implementation of the new clause in due course. There will be an opportunity for the specific targets and responsibilities of local authorities, and for the Secretary of State's relationship, to be determined.

Mr. Dodds: I am grateful to the Minister. He refers to something that I was going to explore: the purpose of the new clause. He talks of giving the Secretary of State certain powers. Perhaps he can clarify that. Is it not the case that, under the terms of the new clause, public authorities, whether they are Northern Ireland Departments or district councils, will immediately be subject to the duty? It does not require a further order by the Secretary of State. The powers that he is taking relate to introducing an Order in Council to allow the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to designate other bodies. That is significant because, when the new clause passes into law and receives Royal Assent, Northern Ireland Departments and local authorities will be subject to its provisions from that time forward, without the need for any further action. That is a major innovation .

1.30 pm

To my knowledge, there has not been much discussion in the council of which I am a member in Belfast about the duty and obligation that will be imposed. I would be grateful if the Minister would say what discussions have taken place with local authorities in Northern Ireland on that issue. What will the cost implications be for local authorities? What assessment has been made of that? We are all aware that all this is important, but clearly there are costs involved and it is important that we understand that, too.

Today we may pass legislation that is entirely laudable in its objectives, but people may come to us afterwards and say, "We could have done with a lot more discussion about what it will mean in practice." I invite the Minister to address some of those issues.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): We certainly support new clause 1 and amendment No. 1. Sustainable development is clearly an important aim for public authorities and we support the Government placing a duty on public authorities to achieve sustainable development. I want to raise a similar issue. Are the Government considering placing a duty on public bodies to promote the shared future agenda? It is now over a year since the Government published their framework document, "A Shared Future". Although that document was strong on vision and principles, it was light on policy specifics. At that time, the Government made commitments to publish the first in a series of shared future action plans in the autumn of 2005. That is now well overdue. Although the Government have freely used the concept of the shared future in speeches, there seems to be a lack of specifics. Surely that should be a priority for public bodies in Northern Ireland. Perhaps the Minister can explain what the Government's intentions are on the shared future agenda.

Mr. Hanson: I am grateful for the broad welcome for the measure from hon. Members on both sides of the House. As I said, on 9 May, the Secretary of State outlined his vision of a sustainable development strategy for Northern Ireland. That backs up the Government's £59 million package of measures to help to support a range of initiatives on sustainable development in Northern Ireland. The principle today is that we give the Secretary of State a power to place that duty on local councils.

As I indicated in an intervention, I inherited the post of Deputy First Minister and First Minister a week ago following the internal reshuffle in Northern Ireland. It is our intention to look at how we can consult on the issues that the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) mentioned—the practicalities and what the duty means in practice. We want to ensure that we encourage local authorities and other public bodies to act in a sustainable way. That will include looking at recycling, energy conservation and a range of issues to help to build a sustainable Northern Ireland. I accept fully that there may in due course be cost implications. In due course, duties may be placed. It is my intention and that of colleagues, following the Secretary of State's announcement, to look at the issue of guidance and what the provision means in practice, and to issue that for consultation with local authorities as part of examining the matter in more detail.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Can the Minister clarify subsection (1) of new clause 1, which states "A public authority must"—there is an imperative—

"in exercising its functions, act in the way it considers best calculated to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development",

There is a must and then there is a broad brush. They can do little, they can do much. It is as they believe best. Is that what this is about?

Mr. Hanson: That is a similar point to the one that was made by the hon. Member for Belfast, North. I intend in broad terms today to get the support of the House for a sustainable development strategy for Northern Ireland and for the measure to place a duty on local authorities to contribute to that. Having inherited this post some seven days ago, I want to consult on how that duty will operate in practice, what the relationship is and what the targets are. I want to examine that in detail so that we can get collective ownership of those targets, for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

I hope that it will be of help to the hon. Gentleman when I say that the Northern Ireland Local Government Association has been an active stakeholder and participant in helping to draw up the strategy that the Secretary of State launched on 9 May. The councils' living more sustainably working group has also been involved in the consultations to get us where we are. However, more guidance is needed. Today, I hope that the House will support the principle of sustainable development generally.

The Government take the whole question of the shared future programme and the "A Shared Future" document extremely seriously. I hope that the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) knows that the Secretary of State in the past fortnight has relaunched that document. It is our intention, while we hold office in the direct rule Administration, to ensure not only that are we advocates for a shared future in Northern Ireland as a whole but that we look in detail at how to implement "A Shared Future" in government in Northern Ireland.

With the mini re-shuffle in Northern Ireland, I assumed responsibility for "A Shared Future" some eight days ago. I intend as part of the ministerial team to look at how, in what I hope will be the short time I hold this post in the Assembly, to drive forward that agenda to meet our objectives. We may disagree on this, but I believe that we cannot legislate for "A Shared Future" in that way but that we need to examine how we can put it into practice in due course. I will look at the strategy and take that on board. I am happy to discuss with the hon. Gentleman outside this place his party's views on that matter, as I am with any others, but the whole ministerial team is committed to ensuring that "A Shared Future" operates in practice.

The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) is right that Wales has Executive power vested in the National Assembly. As I have said, the new clause will allow for further public authorities to be designated for the purposes of the duty. I reconfirm that it is open to the Northern Ireland Assembly in due course to make those requests accordingly. I hope that the Assembly has an early opportunity to do that. I hope that hon. Members can support the new clause. I take on board the points that have been made, but hope that hon. Members will support it and await the guidance in due course.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I congratulate the Minister on his elevation to the post of First Minister. I hope that he brings the poise, charm and personality that he has shown in the past 12 months to that office, too.

Like my colleagues, I welcome the commitment to sustainable development but the biggest difficulty for me is the deep concern at the measure coming suddenly at us and perhaps us not having time to think it through. The biggest offenders in opposing or obstructing sustainable development in Northern Ireland are Government Departments, particularly the old Department of the Environment, which is now split up into the department of environment, the department of regional development and the department of social development. Will this legislation do anything to ensure that Government Departments, particularly the department of regional development, will use recycled building materials in Government contracts? Until now, Government have refused to allow recycled materials in Government contracts.

Mr. Hanson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind comments. I think that that is the nicest thing he has said to me all year and it is only the fifth month of the year, so we are doing quite well. From my perspective and that of the Government, the key objective of the Secretary of State in requesting this power and in promoting sustainable development is to examine the issues in terms of not just public bodies outside central Government but central Government themselves.

My hon. Friend made a suggestion with regard to recycled building materials. I am sure that such issues can be examined by Government Departments. We intend simply to put at the heart of government the question of sustainable development, including a range of measures on which central Government will work on over the next few weeks and months until the Assembly, I hope, takes on such responsibilities. We will use guidance and examination to encourage other public bodies to undertake such activity. Without commenting on specific proposals, I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) that there is a central Government drive to create sustainability in central Government and other public bodies. We are open to suggestions as to how we achieve that, but it is imperative that we undertake such a drive. For the reasons that I have outlined, I commend the new clause and amendment to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 3

CONDITIONS FOR DEVOLVING POLICING AND JUSTICE MATTERS

'(1) Amend section 4 of the 1998 Act (transferred, excepted and reserved matters) as follows.

(2) In subsection (2), for "subsection (3)" substitute "subsections (2A) and (3)".

(3) After subsection (2) insert—

"(2A) The Secretary of State shall not lay before Parliament under subsection (2) the draft of an Order amending Schedule 3 so that a devolved policing and justice matter ceases to be a reserved matter unless—

(a) a motion for a resolution praying that the matter should cease to be a reserved matter is tabled by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly; and

(b) the resolution is passed by the Assembly with the support of a majority of the members voting on the motion, a majority of the designated Nationalists voting and a majority of the designated Unionists voting."

(4) In subsection (3), for "the draft of an Order before Parliament under subsection (2)" substitute "before Parliament under subsection (2) the draft of any other Order".

(5) After subsection (5) insert—

"(6) In this section "devolved policing and justice matter" means a matter falling within a description specified in—

(a) any of paragraphs 9 to 12, 14A to 15A and 17 of Schedule 3; or

(b) any other provision of that Schedule designated for this purpose by an order made by the Secretary of State."

(6) In this Part "the 1998 Act" means the Northern Ireland Act 1998 (c. 47).'. —[Mr. Hanson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hanson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendments Nos. 2 to 8.

Amendment No. 24, in schedule 2, page 23, line 32 at end insert

'provided that they have first secured the consent of the nominating officer of the political party to which each member belongs.'.

Amendment No. 14, in page 23, line 34 leave out from 'passed' to end of line 38 and insert 'with cross-community support'.

Amendment No. 26, in page 23, line 39 at end insert—

'(5) Standing orders may make further provision for the nomination and election referred to in subsections (3) and (4).'.

Amendment No. 27, in page 24, line 19 at end insert—

'or

'(d) he is dismissed by the nominating officer whose consent was required for his nomination under subsection (3) (or that officer's successor) and the Presiding Officer is notified of his dismissal.'.

Amendment No. 30, in page 24, line 25 at end insert—

'(10A) Where—

(a) relevant Ministerial offices have been filled by applying sub-paragraph 10(b); and

(b) a relevant Ministerial office is filled by a member of a different political party

all Northern Ireland Ministers shall cease to hold office and their Ministerial offices shall be filled by applying subsections (2) to (6) of section 18 within a period specified by standing orders.

(12) But where—

(a) a relevant minister was dismissed by the nominating officer who nominated him (or his successor); and

(b) the nominating officer of that party refuses to consent to the nomination by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister of every member of his party within a period specified in standing orders, sub-paragraph (10A) shall not apply.'.

Government amendment No. 9

Amendment No. 15, in page 26, line 29 leave out from 'passed' to end of line 33 and insert 'with cross-community support'.

Government amendments Nos. 10 to 12.

Mr. Hanson: The Government new clause and amendments were tabled after our helpful discussions in Committee and on Second Reading and they deal with issues relating to the devolution of policing and justice functions. I shall speak first to new clause 3, then consider Government amendments Nos. 5, 6, 8, 9 and 11, which make related and consequential changes.

It has always been the Government's position that policing and justice can be devolved on a sustainable basis only with broad cross-community support. We have put in place a triple lock, as the Assembly must wish to have devolution, the Secretary of State must wish to agree it on behalf of the Government, and the House of Commons must approve it. Consistent with that position, it is our view that the support of the majority of sections of the community in Northern Ireland is essential if the devolution of policing and justice is to succeed. The amendments give legal effect to that position. New subsection (2A) inserted into section 4 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 by new clause 3(3) accordingly provides that the Secretary of State shall not introduce an order to devolve policing and justice unless a number of caveats are in place.

First, the Assembly motion asking the Secretary of State to do that must be tabled by the First and Deputy First Ministers acting jointly. Secondly, that motion should receive support in the Assembly from a majority of designated Unionists and a majority of designated nationalists. Having listened to the discussion, it is self-evident that unless the Assembly has that support it is not worth considering forcing devolution on it. The fact that under the amendments the First and Deputy First Ministers would have to introduce a proposal shows that a majority of community support is necessary. We want a majority of nationalists and designated Unionists to support it, too. New clause 5 (5) introduces a drafting change to that effect.

On Government amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7 and 10, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have made it clear during the passage of the Bill that it is the Government's intention to ensure that the Assembly has the greatest possible flexibility to determine the departmental models to oversee policing and justice.

Lady Hermon: Will the Minister clarify what precisely is meant by the triple lock? He referred to a cross-community vote in the Assembly, agreement by the Secretary of State and approval by Parliament. However, new clause 3 imposes another triple lock: the First and Deputy First Ministers act jointly, then a resolution is passed by the Assembly with cross-community support, then an order is laid before the House. What is the Secretary of State's role in that arrangement? Is it part of the triple lock or is it redefined, so that he is substituted by the First and Deputy First Ministers?

1.45 pm

Mr. Hanson: If the hon. Lady wishes to be pedantic, perhaps it is a quadruple lock. The Secretary of State and I seek a situation in which devolution of policing and criminal justice takes place following a cross-community vote among nationalists and Unionists in the Assembly in support of the proposal, which is then considered by my right hon. Friend or his successor, who agrees to recommend it as Government policy to the House of Commons, which must support it before it can take place. That is a triple lock. The hon. Lady wishes to make it a quadruple lock because there is a two-part assessment when the Assembly reaches its decision. However, I put it in the following terms: the Assembly; the Secretary of State; the House of Commons.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): What happens if a designated Unionist does a back flip? Is he redesignated as another sort of Unionist, or does he remain a designated Unionist with his original label? I refer to current events.

Mr. Hanson: Current events are obviously extremely important and my esteemed colleague Eileen Bell, the Speaker of the Assembly, has sought legal advice on the matter. Lest I confuse any lawyers who are looking at the issue, it is best to allow that legal advice to be given so that Eileen Bell can make her judgment in due course.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Minister will know that I have long been concerned about triple and quadruple locks because they can be manipulated, as the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) suggested. The Minister assured us in previous proceedings on the Bill that he would consult the parties about their preferred mechanism of election. Has he done so?

Mr. Hanson: Again, the purpose of the measure is quite simple. However we describe it, it is a simple process. The Assembly must submit a request to the Secretary of State asking for the devolution of policing. The Secretary of State must agree—presumably, that will involve discussion with Cabinet colleagues because he must make an assessment or political judgment as to whether he wishes to recommend it—and he must make a recommendation at the Dispatch Box to the House of Commons, which must support it before it can take place. That is a simple, straightforward process, as the Assembly, the Secretary of State and the House of Commons must secure approval for the proposal. I am certainly happy with our position, which I discussed with individuals when considering whether to table the amendments. I have tried to facilitate a procedure so that, should the Assembly wish to do so, it can advance the proposal in due course.

Mark Durkan: Does the Minister accept that talk of triple and quadruple locks involves double-speak? In the past, whenever the Democratic Unionist party referred to the triple lock that it says that it achieved in the comprehensive agreement, it meant that it could control whether or not there was movement on the devolution of justice and policing. It would be able to control the form of the Department and the appointment of Ministers. That triple lock is different from the triple lock outlined by the Minister.

Mr. Hanson: I hope that my hon. Friend accepts that we are at a stage where the Assembly does not formally constitute an Executive. There will not necessarily be movement towards that framework in the foreseeable future, so we will put in place such a framework. Neither he nor I know whether any movement towards devolved criminal justice and policing will take place before or after a further Assembly election. I cannot even envisage a situation in which I know who will be the First and Deputy First Ministers or which will be the majority parties in the Assembly when a decision is made to effect the devolution of criminal justice and policing.

Mark Durkan: Does that mean that further legislation on the matter might be needed?

Mr. Hanson: No. I am trying to put in place a framework so that when the Assembly wishes to do so, it can request devolution of criminal justice and policing. With due respect to my hon. Friend, he is over-complicating matters that are simple. I hope that, as ever, he will trust my judgment and relax.

Lady Hermon: May I convey to the Minister a point of reference? His colleague, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, gave evidence to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee almost exactly a week ago, in which he referred to the triple lock on the devolution of policing and justice. He stated:

"It requires across community votes in the Assembly"— that is precisely what he said. He went on to say that

"it then requires a Secretary of State to agree it, and Parliament to approve the necessary legislation."

[Lady Hermon]

At no stage was there any reference to the First and Deputy First Ministers acting jointly. [Interruption.] With great respect to those who are making comments from a sedentary position, they will get their opportunity later. Will the Minister elaborate? Did the Secretary of State know last week, when he gave evidence live to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, that there was a fourth element, or has the definition been changed within the week? As usual, the Northern Ireland Office moves with great speed on these matters.

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Lady will know that there was discussion of these matters in Committee and the Government have reflected on that. The new clause to allow the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to propose that change is important, but it does not change the balance of the argument. It would be strange if the Assembly voted to devolve criminal justice and policing, but the First Minister and Deputy First Minister were against it, as they will presumably be the leaders of the largest parties in the Assembly.

We have tabled the amendments and new clauses to support the wish of the Assembly for such devolution. I say again to all hon. Members that the Assembly must decide, the Secretary of State must agree and the House of Commons must support that process. That may happen at some point when the Assembly forms its Executive.

I shall make progress. During the passage of the Bill, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have made clear the Government's intention to make possible a range of departmental models for devolution of policing and criminal justice. Amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7 and 10 support that objective. We discussed the Northern Ireland Act 1998 in detail in Committee and we considered a range of models in the Act for the devolution of policing and criminal justice. Section 16 of the 1998 Act permits the Assembly to create various forms of departmental responsibility. We have sought to broaden that choice through consultation on the Bill.

As hon. Members may recall, during the debate in the Committee of the whole House on 20 April, my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) suggested that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Bill, there was at least one further model that had not been considered—a department of policing and justice that might be in the charge of a single Minister elected on a cross-community resolution of the Assembly, rather than appointed under the d'Hondt process.

I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that his words of wisdom have been listened to by the Government and we have tabled an amendment which, I hope, meets the objectives that he set in the debate on 20 April. He will know, therefore, that on occasion the Government act in a comradely fashion with his party. I cannot help him on every occasion, but when I can I am pleased to do so, and I will labour the point to keep him on his toes. Amendment No. 3 provides for the new model. Amendments Nos. 2, 10 and 7 reflect that addition.

Amendments Nos. 14 and 15 were tabled by the Liberal Democrats. In Committee, I undertook to reflect on the points made by the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) at the time. The Government's view is that a department of policing and justice with joint or rotating Ministers would bear a strong similarity to the office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and correspondingly the requirement for cross-community support for those Ministers, set out in the Bill, reflects that for the First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

On reflection, I have concerns that that is a move away from the requirement for parallel consent from both sides of the community. Having considered the matter in detail, I have concluded that that support for any nomination for ministerial appointment to a department with devolved policing and justice functions that makes use of one of the models provided for in the Bill should continue to be required to secure parallel consent. This may disappoint the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), but it is important that we keep to the original principles.

As drafted, the Bill requires Ministers under the alternative models for the department of policing and justice to be nominated by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and for their nomination to be approved by the Assembly with the support of a majority of Members. The amendments give effect to that, on the basis of the 50:50:50 model.

The amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle would remove the responsibility for nomination and subsequent dismissal from the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and put it in the hands of party nominating officers. I do not believe that to be workable or consistent. I am sorry that I cannot help my hon. Friend on this occasion and I ask him to withdraw the amendments, given that I have been able to help him in other respects during consideration of the Bill.

I hope that Members in all parts of the House will recognise that the amendments are the result of amendments tabled but not debated, discussion in Committee and representations made to me from all parts of the House relating to the devolution of criminal justice and policing. I commend the Government new clauses and amendments to the House and ask Liberal Democrat and Social Democratic and Labour party Members to recognise that I have moved some way and to withdraw their amendments accordingly.

Lembit Öpik: I listened with interest to the Minister and accept that he has provided us with a clear exposition of where he stands. He rightly highlighted the issues that we address in our amendments Nos. 14 and 15. The amendments were tabled in Committee, and in his reply the Minister said that he would reflect on them and discuss with political parties whether they wanted some flexibility in the voting arrangements. We appreciate that there has not been much time between Committee and Report for such discussions, but we re-tabled the amendments to give the Minister an opportunity to update the House. He has given his view, but I infer that he has not explicitly spoken with the parties.

I remind the Minister of his words. He said in Committee:

> "I am reasonably flexible in the matter. Although 50:50:50 was our original choice, the amendment would mean that there were two methods."

He is right about that. He continued:

"I have not discussed the election of a criminal justice Minister with any of the parties in Northern Ireland to take their views about what would be acceptable to the Assembly, but I am reasonably content to look into that possibility."—[Official Report, 20 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 297.]

It is a small gripe, but I believe that, the Government having imposed the timetable on us, the Minister was obliged to undertake some consultation, and I am disappointed that he has not done so.

Mr. Hanson: We have been in discussion with parties on various issues. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that there is a range of issues before political parties in Northern Ireland. The Bill is not necessarily at the forefront of everyone's mind, given the issues relating to the restoration of the Assembly. I am happy to discuss the matter with the parties, as I have said before. We have had some general consultations, I have reflected seriously on the matter and I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept my good faith.

Lembit Öpik: We differ on the judgment about the electoral system, but I shall not repeat the argument because the Minister has made it clear that he will not accept our suggestions, which is fair enough. We will not push our amendment to a vote on that issue, which simply involves a difference of view. My point concerns the process. The Minister knows about the frustrations when the Government impose and do not consult. Without being too heavy on him, I wish that the Government would be more assiduous in going through the consultation process after they have inferred in this Chamber that they will do so. I hope that the Minister will take that point on board, notwithstanding the difference of view on specific amendments.

New clause 3 seems to insist that the devolution of policing and justice functions can occur only when the motion before the Assembly is laid jointly by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That makes sense for the reasons that the Minister has outlined, as does the requirement that the motion should be approved by a majority within the Assembly as a whole.

The rest of the amendments seem to be largely technical. In his response to our brief debate, I hope that the Minister will clarify my concern about Government amendments Nos. 4 and 6. Does the consequence of those amendments limit the ability of the political parties to decide the shape of any department of policing and justice, and do those amendments mean that there can be only one department that incorporates policing and justice functions?

Mr. Hanson: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Assembly has full flexibility to determine which model it uses. All I am trying to do is provide the broadest possible menu, to which I have added one additional option with the help of my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle.

Lembit Öpik: The Minister's intervention is helpful, because the record will show that those amendments do not prohibit the setting up of separate departments for policing and for justice, if that is what the Assembly wants to do. I have no reason to think that the Assembly wants to do that, but it would be in keeping with the spirit of giving the Assembly the right to organise its devolved processes not to preclude that option. I thank the Minister for that clarification.

The SDLP amendments seem to make sense. One might think that it goes without saying that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister would not nominate a person for ministerial office if that person's political party did not want them to take up that position. Given the history of politics in Northern Ireland, however, we know that anything is possible. I look forward to further clarification from the SDLP spokesman, whoever he may be, but I am sympathetic to the common-sense position adopted in the amendments because, as we all know from painful experience, when it comes to some matters relating to Northern Ireland legislation, sense is not common.

Mark Durkan: I will raise our concerns about new clause 3 and some of the Government amendments and our support for some of the other Government amendments, but first I shall speak in favour of our amendments Nos. 24, 26, 27 and 30. Furthermore, we will lend our support to Liberal Democrat amendments Nos. 14 and 15, at least in terms of this debate.

Our amendments aim to address a fundamental unfairness in the legislation. The starting point for understanding our amendments is the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which implemented the d'Hondt system in the Good Friday agreement. Under the 1998 Act, the nominating officer of each party, who is usually the party leader, appoints Ministers, and they have the power to fire those Ministers, unless, of course, the Assembly chooses to exclude Ministers from office for particular reasons.

By contrast, under the system in the Bill, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister would choose the justice Ministers. If they wanted to do so, they could nominate a member of another party, perhaps even against the wishes of that party's leader, which happens from time to time in politics. In southern Irish politics, there is the famous example of Charlie Haughey appointing a member of the Fianna Fail parliamentary party to be European Commissioner to force a by-election to convenience himself.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): There was also the Speaker in the previous Assembly.

Mark Durkan: As the hon. Gentleman has said, that also happened in the previous Assembly with the post of Speaker, when issues went on inside a particular party. On that occasion, Caesar did in Brutus, but such events have occurred for calculated reasons.

We must remember that the Bill provides that a ministerial appointment will count against the party whose member is appointed a Minister for the purposes of the d'Hondt system. The parties would therefore be denied their own legitimate and proper choice under the d'Hondt system by virtue of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister perhaps selecting somebody from another party without the agreement of that party or that party's leader through the use of the parallel consent mechanism. That is fundamentally unfair, and it goes against the grain of the Good Friday agreement in terms of inclusion and the choices that rest with parties. It is a return to the principle of parties not being able to vet or veto each other's appointments.

[Mark Durkan]

Amendment No. 24 seeks to address that matter by stating that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister may nominate a person for the justice portfolio only with the consent of that party's nominating officer. So, contrary to what the Minister has said, we are not in the business of denying the First Minister and Deputy First Minister any role in the matter. We say that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister should only be able to nominate for the police and justice portfolio with the consent of a party's nominating officer, given that that party's d'Hondt quota will be affected and that its ranking of choice under d'Hondt will be materially affected.

Amendments Nos. 24, 26, 27 and 30 apply only to joint Ministers, as they are currently drafted. However, I contend that the same approach should logically apply to rotating Ministers, for which the Bill provides, or, indeed, to a Minister elected with parallel consent, which is covered by the Government amendment that the Minister discussed earlier.

Amendment No. 26 makes a consequential amendment to allow the standing orders to permit the nomination and election of joint justice Ministers. That would be helpful to ensure clarity on procedure in the same way as the standing orders for the Assembly under the Northern Ireland Act 2006 provide helpful procedural clarity on, for instance, how to manage if two sets of people are proposed as joint Ministers.

Amendments Nos. 27 and 30 address the dismissal of a Minister. As has been said, Ministers appointed under the d'Hondt system are appointed by, and may be dismissed by, the leader of their party—the Assembly may also choose to exclude them. Under the Bill, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister have the sole power of dismissal, although holding ministerial office counts towards a party's d'Hondt entitlements. Even more significantly, the Bill is wide open for abuse, because it specifies that holding office as a junior Minister counts towards a party's entitlements under d'Hondt.

The First Minister and Deputy First Minister could appoint a member of another party, using the votes of their own parties under parallel consent to secure that appointment, only to dismiss them and vote in a member of one of their own parties instead after the d'Hondt system had been run for other ministerial offices.

Mr. Dodds: I am trying very hard to follow the hon. Gentleman's reasoning, which involves a lot of hypotheticals. As the hon. Gentleman deals with the minutiae of the mechanics of the appointment of a possible Minister, will he accept that the situation is surreal, because the prospect of the community having any confidence in the devolution of policing and justice powers in Northern Ireland is remote? We should consider the matter in that context.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. That may well be so, but the fact is that we are faced with this Bill, which is asking us to arrange the furniture in what may be castles in the air. That is the nature of the legislative exercise that we are undertaking. The Minister has indicated on several occasions that some of this goes back to previous discussions—perhaps more of that anon.

Under the Bill as it stands, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, who would clearly be from Sinn Fein and the DUP on current numbers, can appoint somebody from another party. They can vote that person into office using their own votes under parallel consent against the wishes of that party, thereby altering its d'Hondt entitlements. They can then subsequently fire that Minister or those Ministers and replace them with somebody from their own party, and the party that originally lost out under d'Hondt still loses out. It gets fewer Ministers than it is entitled to under d'Hondt by virtue of the First and Deputy First Ministers using the power that the Bill gives them. That is fundamentally unfair. The problem with the Bill is that control is given solely to the parties of the First and Deputy First Ministers, not to the Assembly or to anybody else.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Let me try to clarify something. I understood the hon. Gentleman to have said that if the First and Deputy First Ministers were to appoint a member of another party without the approval of that party, that would use up one of their d'Hondt entitlements. Where does he see that?

Mark Durkan: If the hon. Gentleman reads the schedules, he will see the various permutations that are offered for joint Ministers, rotating Ministers or any other types of Minister, all of whom have to be appointed before d'Hondt can be run. Schedule 2 provides that the d'Hondt arithmetic will already count the holding of a justice ministerial office as the holding of a ministerial office. Under the M plus one formula, when d'Hondt is run, M will include a justice ministerial office already held whether under rotating junior and senior or joint ministerial offices. That means that if Sinn Fein and the DUP appoint their own party members as joint justice Ministers, they will lose their first entitlement under d'Hondt. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not know that. I remember that when he asked the Minister on Second Reading whether it would count towards d'Hondt, the Minister was unable to provide the answer, but the schedules make it clear that it does.

It could well be that Sinn Fein and the DUP do not want to use up their first entitlements under d'Hondt by appointing members of their own parties to be joint or rotating justice Ministers. They may pull the stroke of trying to appoint people from other parties to those Ministries in order to preserve their own d'Hondt entitlements and reduce the d'Hondt ranking preferences of other parties, and then, at a subsequent date, use the powers in the Bill to dismiss those Ministers from other parties and replace them with members of their own parties, thereby securing more than their own d'Hondt entitlements and denying other parties their entitlements. That abuse is wide open and available under the Bill as it stands.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Like other hon. Members, I have endeavoured to follow the hon. Gentleman's logic. Is it not all predicated upon a Member who has been nominated by the nominating officer of another party voluntarily indicating that he or she wishes to be nominated? That was not the position that the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) took whenever he was nominated by his party leader but declined. If someone declined, the situation would not materialise.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about that. Under the Bill as it stands, even with the new Government amendments, no consent whatsoever is required from the nominating officer of the party.

Mr. Campbell: I said consent from the Member nominated.

Mark Durkan: Indeed—the consent of the Member nominated. That applies on a standard basis under d'Hondt. The First and Deputy First Ministers from Sinn Fein and the DUP might well hope that they can inveigle Members from other parties to take such posts against the wishes and advice of their own parties. They can vote them into post, even against the votes of their own party, and still deny that party its entitlements under d'Hondt.

2.15 pm

Dr. McCrea: Is not the hon. Gentleman casting aspersions on his own Members? Is he afraid of them turning Turk and taking a post that he does not want them to have?

Mark Durkan: I am certainly not afraid of that. I have doubts and worries about other parties, given the rate at which the DUP has been able to inveigle defections and all sorts of disloyal activities in other parties. That is where I have my doubts. I would also note the Alliance party's occasional proclivities for running after a post that might happen to become available.

We need to ensure that nothing in the Bill creates new difficulties and unfairnesses. The Bill as it stands, even with the Government amendments, does create an unfairness. As things stand, the First and Deputy First Ministers can bring about a situation whereby their parties hold the first ministerial and deputy first ministerial offices and the justice ministerial office, as well as other ordinary ministerial offices, as though they did not hold the justice ministerial office. If the Government are serious in their intent to ensure that the justice ministerial post counts properly towards d'Hondt and does not materially affect or prejudice any party's d'Hondt entitlement, they should be prepared to accept amendments Nos. 27 and 30, which seek to rectify that possibility.

Amendment No. 27 would strike a compromise that is contrary to the Minister's suggestion that we are trying to strip the First and Deputy First Ministers of any role in the appointment of justice Ministers. It would provide that the nominating officer of a party can dismiss a justice Minister from his party, just as the party leader can for ministerial offices allocated under d'Hondt. By way of compromise, we would also allow the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to dismiss a justice Minister, even one of another party. However, amendment No. 30 would provide an important safeguard. If they dismiss a justice Minister and replace him with a Minister from a different political party from that of the outgoing justice Minister, d'Hondt has to be re-run for ordinary ministerial offices as well. That would build in a protection against abuse by removing the temptation for it—likewise, for example, if the Assembly or the First Minister and Deputy First Minister refused to support the replacement that a party leader would want where a vacancy arose because of the resignation or death of a justice Minister from that party.

I accept that it is important to guard against a party leader trying to abuse the system by then sacking his own justice Minister and refusing to allow the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to nominate anybody at all from their party so as to trigger a rerun of d'Hondt for all ministerial offices. I am seeking to prevent the temptation for abuse and tactical manoeuvres by the First and Deputy First Ministers and by party leaders.

Mr. Hanson: I would say to my hon. Friend—I mean this in the nicest possible way—that we are in danger of legislating for every single possibility. I am trying to put in place mechanisms for the devolution of police and criminal justice that have the broad support of the Assembly and provide an opportunity to appoint Ministers. He may be looking at this in too much detail.

Mark Durkan: In that case, I would ask the Minister why we are dealing with any of this legislation at all. We are dealing with issues of permutations. When other parties are insisting that they need safeguards and triple locks to protect them from all sorts of perils, is it not right that we who are here to legislate on these matters should ensure that we do that properly, so as to prevent unintended problems and contrary effects to those that the Government claim to intend?

We have tabled amendments that would avoid re-running d'Hondt on a tactical basis by parties. That would mean that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister could nominate a person from a different political party, without the inconvenience of re-running d'Hondt for ordinary ministerial offices. I ask the Government to reflect on our amendments, even if they do not accept them now. Perhaps they will consider introducing their own amendments elsewhere that would have a similar effect. They would protect the integrity of what the Government say that the Bill is trying to achieve, namely to provide arrangements for a menu of options from which to appoint justice Ministers without doing any damage to the basic architecture of the inclusion formula in the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

I also want to express our support for the Liberal Democrat amendments Nos. 14 and 15. They would make it clear that justice Ministers could be elected by cross-community consent, in contrast to the present requirement for parallel consent alone. The Good Friday agreement and the Northern Ireland Act 1998 provide for only two occasions on which parallel consent alone is required: the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and in the context of the special equality procedure. We see no reason why that especially high threshold should be required solely in those circumstances.

We are obviously not content with the Government's new clause 3 and consequential amendments Nos. 5, 6, 8 and 9. Section 4 of the Northern Ireland Act already states that devolution of any additional functions cannot occur without prior Assembly cross-community support. However, new clause 3 proposes that additional requirements be introduced only for policing and justice. The First Minister and Deputy First Minister must pray that the matter be devolved, and a vote by parallel consent—and only by parallel consent—must also take place. For no good reason, that is being required here. But perhaps there is a bad reason, and perhaps this goes back to previous deals and understandings.

After the comprehensive agreement in 2004, the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) boasted:

"The Comprehensive Agreement is merely the core of the proposals which we have accepted but is also augmented by over a hundred clarificatory answers, notes and letters."

The Government have refused to publish those documents, despite their assurance to the House on 18 April that

"the talks will be genuinely all-party. Whatever happened in the past, and whatever the arguments about that are, given the distrust that has set in over the past couple of years, we cannot proceed without all-party, inclusive negotiations."—[Official Report, 18 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 27.]

How inclusive are more than 100 side deals and secret understandings with the DUP and, presumably, Sinn Fein that the rest of us are not allowed to see? Are these proposals the by-product of them? There seem to be clear indications that that is the case. Martin McGuinness is on public record as saying that the whole issue of how the devolution of justice and policing was to be dealt with was all done and dusted in the negotiations in the run-up to the comprehensive agreement. Are we now seeing the result of all that doing and dusting here in the legislation? Is that why the Minister cannot accept even a straightforward amendment such as the one tabled by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik)?

Lembit Öpik: In the hon. Gentleman's opinion, would it be helpful if the Minister could give a categorical assurance, for the record, that no side deals were involved in the formulation of this element of the Bill and the Government's amendments to it?

Mark Durkan: It would be helpful and interesting if the Minister could do that. Whether it would be convincing is another matter.

Mr. Hanson: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take this in the spirit in which it is intended: I have made no side deals on this matter.

Mark Durkan: I know exactly the spirit in which that was intended, and I take the Minister's assurance in exactly those terms.

Why will not the Government lay in the Library all the other commitments that they have given in this regard, so that the rest of us can at least see what they are and, if necessary, debate them in the Chamber? A member of the SDLP sought under the terms of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to gain sight of the various side deals, many of which presumably affect strand 1 institutions and matters such as the devolution of justice and policing. However, we were denied sight of any of those documents on the ground that their disclosure might colour or jeopardise the Government's relationship with the Irish Republic. Yet they deal solely with strand 1 matters, which the DUP says that it is very good at safeguarding, saying that there is no Irish Government interest or input in them. We cannot have sight of any of the deals that were, according to Sinn Fein, done and dusted, and that obviously matter so much, according to the hon. Member for Belfast, East, on the ground that they affect the relationship with the Irish Government.

We as legislators have the right to know where all this is coming from, as well as wanting to see where it is all going to. The SDLP wants a process of equals, because that is the only way to build trust. It is the only way to make progress. That is why we ask the Government to live up to the commitment that they made to inclusive negotiations in Parliament this month, and to let all see all.

The Minister will be glad to hear that, by contrast, the SDLP is happy to support Government amendments Nos. 2, 3 and 7. These allow for the possibility of a single Minister to be elected by cross-community support and by parallel consent. That said, that might not be our preferred option for the appointment of a justice Minister. However, if the point of the Bill is to provide for a menu of options from which the parties may choose, that option should be included.

The reason for all this difficulty, and the reason why nearly all of us have been caught trying to put the cart before the horse, is that the Government have launched us into legislating for these options at a time when the parties have not been truly negotiating and debating them. That is why the Minister is having difficulty in presenting the Bill, and why the rest of us are having difficulty in presenting our amendments.

We say again, however—as we have in our support for the Liberal Democrat amendments Nos. 14 and 15—that the vote should involve either version of cross-community support, and not parallel consent alone. We also have difficulties with Government amendment No. 4, which limits to one the number of Departments that have joint, rotating or single cross-community elected Ministers. We do not want more joint Ministers in more Departments, but the Government have gone too far in removing the possibility that, if the Assembly decides on two separate Departments for justice and policing, there could be a single Minister in each Department, elected by cross-community support. Again, I must stress that we are not advocating two separate Departments, but that might be a choice that the Assembly wishes to make. If two Departments were created under d'Hondt, we do not see why the same should not be done if the Assembly decided to have single Ministers in separate Departments voted in by cross-community support.

The Minister has stressed that he wants the legislation to go forward. We have some difficulties with it, but we are not going to create more difficulty for him or for anyone else. We ask that he considers carefully the points that we have made. I have answered his unfair misrepresentation of our amendments as having the effect of removing completely powers from the First and Deputy First Minister in respect of justice Ministers. We are trying to get a balance of responsibility and rights between parties, and between the First and Deputy First Minister. I therefore commend our amendments, and the spirit of them, to the Minister for further consideration.

2.30 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson: I bet that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) spends his leisure moments watching "The X Files" or perhaps "Trainspotting". He has taken us beyond what my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) described in terms of a situation that is difficult to comprehend, with an enabling Bill and the particulars of unforeseen circumstances. Instead, the hon. Member for Foyle was able to offer us a series of possibilities. I intervened on him to point out that the d'Hondt mechanism would not be affected in all circumstances, but given that he was able to go on at such length on matters that will not necessarily occur, I was afraid to intervene further to tell him what those circumstances might be, as he could have gone on for at least another half-hour.

The reality is that there are circumstances in which policing and justice can be devolved without d'Hondt being affected. If the trainspotter who prepared the script for the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that, however, I will not draw it to his attention until much later, even if he asks me. I will put it alongside the more than 100 understandings that we had. Perhaps he can get one of his colleagues to make a written request for it under freedom of information.

Mark Durkan: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there are circumstances under which d'Hondt is clearly affected? Has he read the schedules?

Mr. Robinson: I do not need to read the schedules. It is clear from the Bill that there are circumstances in which d'Hondt would be affected. If the hon. Gentleman really believes, however, that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister will put the most important and powerful role in the land in the possession of a member of another political party, I am afraid that he has not been involved in the same kind of politics as me. No First Minister and Deputy First Minister are likely to hand over the role of policing and justice Minister to someone in an opposition party. That is just not real politics.

I welcome some of the amendments put tabled by the Government, especially new clause 3 and amendment No. 3, which are useful.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): On a point of clarification, the hon. Gentleman said that we were in fantasy land if we believed that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister would give a serious portfolio to the opposition. First, can he define whom the opposition are? Secondly, in parallel, would either a member of the First Minister's party or the Deputy First Minister's party—that is, a member of the DUP or Sinn Fein—be acceptable to him as a nominee for the justice Minister's position?

Mr. Robinson: I assume that the opposition parties would be those other than the parties taking the decision. The coalition referred to is mandatory, not voluntary. In the previous Executive, every party was in opposition to every other party. In the Assembly, Ministers voted against legislation brought forward by other Ministers. We had a bizarre set of circumstances.

Dr. McCrea: Before my hon. Friend moves on, may I suggest to him that SDLP Members should be assured that the possibility of a Sinn Fein member being accepted in such a post is far-fetched?

Mr. Robinson: I certainly concur with my hon. Friend. Indeed, the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) will have heard me say, when the Bill was previously considered in the House, that I could not envisage that happening in my lifetime. I am always happy to be surprised about such matters, but the key issue is that the community must be satisfied. I do not believe that the community would be satisfied if people who are associated with those who are involved in terrorism, and who have a history of such involvement, were responsible for policing and justice.

The bizarre nature of the debate has become even more difficult because of the decision by the party of the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) to enter into a formal relationship with a party that speaks for an illegal organisation. I am sure that she supports her leader in his decisions, but I know that the community that I represent cannot understand the Ulster Unionist party's decision to have a formal relationship with the party that speaks for the Ulster Volunteer Force.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Does my hon. Friend accept that, to be fair to the hon. Lady, she is on record, two days before—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are now going rather wide of the debate on the amendment.

Mr. Robinson: It is actually a critical issue, because the way that policing and justice powers will be devolved to Northern Ireland will put such powers in the hands of the Assembly, where there is now a mountain to climb. The criterion that we have consistently adopted is that we could not be in government with those who are linked to parties involved in paramilitary and criminal activity. Out of the blue, the hon. Lady's party has decided to put itself in that position, having condemned Sinn Fein—[Interruption.] I will give way to her if she wants to speak on the issue.

Lady Hermon: That is enormously kind and generous of the hon. Gentleman. He and his colleagues will know that I do not, unlike them, hold a dual mandate. I am not a Member of the Assembly, but only of this House. I was not a party to the decision taken by my colleagues in the Assembly. That decision caused me deep distress. However, having said that, I believe, having had a long conversation last night with my party leader, Sir Reg Empey, that this might allow him an opportunity to exercise leverage on loyalist paramilitaries. It was perfectly obvious that the Northern Ireland Office has no strategy to bring about loyalist decommissioning. If Sir Reg is able to establish now a policy to bring about loyalist decommissioning and prevent any more murders, such as that of Lisa Dorrian in my constituency, that would be worth while. Apart from that, I am deeply distressed by the decision of my party colleagues.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Can we now speak more in generalities than specifics? I accept what the hon. Lady has said, but perhaps we can now continue with the debate.

Mr. Robinson: I thank the hon. Lady for making her personal position clear, and I know that when she has the opportunity to speak to her party leader she will remind him that that was not the reason that he has given publicly for his decision. It was a self-serving reason—or at least he thought that it was—as he thought that his party would get an additional ministerial post. However, he will find that that might not work out as he expected.

To return to new clause 3, policing and justice issues are of such importance that if they are to be devolved to a Northern Ireland Assembly, it is imperative that there is not just general support in the Assembly but, as under the previous legislation, cross-community support.

According to the definition of cross-community support in the earlier legislation, 40 per cent. of votes from one section of the community would have been sufficient. Policing and justice powers could have been devolved even if the majority of the Unionist community, for instance, did not support it. The Government new clause and amendments remedy that in two ways.

The first relates to the parallel methods of securing cross-community support in the Assembly. That support can be secured through an overall majority of Assembly Members, no fewer than 50 per cent. being from the Unionist community and no fewer than 50 per cent. being from the nationalist community. Alternatively, it can be secured through an overall majority, at least 40 per cent. being from either the Unionist or the nationalist community. In new clause 3, the Government specify the former method. There must be an overall majority, and a majority of both nationalists and Unionists. That should ensure real cross-community support: substantial support for the devolution of policing and justice powers in both communities, rather than a majority in one community and a minority in the other. The Government have made a sensible decision, establishing at least one lock for the Northern Ireland community.

The second lock relates to the First and Deputy First Ministers. In practical terms, it would be absurd to provide for circumstances in which the Assembly might decide to devolve policing and justice powers without their consent. The Government have provided for practical circumstances, and for the further lock that my colleagues and I requested. In the comprehensive agreement proposals published by the Government, it was accepted not just by Her Majesty's Government but by the Government of the Irish Republic, and I assume that Sinn Fein approved of it as well—although I cannot say for certain, because we were not speaking to Sinn Fein.

When I mentioned the desirability of this further lock to the Minister on Second Reading and also, I believe, in Committee, he responded that no mischief had been intended by its omission. We attributed its absence to a drafting blip. I am glad that that has now been remedied, and that both those locks are in the Bill.

It is true that there are two further locks, but they are not locks on which the Northern Ireland community would rely on very strongly. The fact that the Secretary of State must give his approval will not engender a great deal of trust and enthusiasm in the Unionist community nor will the need for the approval of the House, which has passed much legislation that has not been supported by the overwhelming majority of people in Northern Ireland. Those two locks may be important to the Government and the House, but they are not as important to the people of Northern Ireland as the first two locks. The first two locks are to the advantage of Unionist and nationalist alike. No Assembly Member need fear that anything will be foisted on the Assembly before the community is ready, and before the Assembly is ready to take its responsibilities. It would be wrong to put such important powers in the hands of an Assembly that was not ready to accept them. I trust that no nationalist or Unionist will dispute what the Government have done, but essentially we are talking about two double locks rather than a quadruple lock.

My second point is that because policing is such an important issue, it may be said to have an important context even before the devolution of policing and justice powers. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) is quoted as having said at the weekend that it was imperative for those who are part of an Executive in Northern Ireland to give their support to policing in Northern Ireland. The point has also been laboured—if he will forgive me for saying so—by the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington). Whenever he has explained what is necessary, he has specified that essential requirement.

2.45 pm

It is hard for anyone who reads about democracy in the text books to believe that someone could be part of an Executive, part of the Government of a country, without supporting the law enforcement agency of that country. It is still harder to believe that a member of an Executive would not support, and in many cases would not even recognise, the courts. That is not a proposition that anyone could seriously contemplate. Anyone who wants to be part of Government in Northern Ireland must be determined to urge people to give evidence to the police if they witness events, to contact the police if they are in need, and to encourage the police to operate freely in their areas. That is essential.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim rightly said that merely joining a police force would not be seen as giving support to the police, and that simply signing up to the devolution powers would certainly not be seen as such. Tangible support will consist of Assembly Members' urging those over whom they have influence to support the police, join the police, give evidence to the police and ask the police to go into their areas.

Sammy Wilson: That condition has pertained since 1998, but has not yet been met by members of Sinn Fein. It is entirely wrong for the Secretary of State to describe it as a new condition.

Mr. Robinson: I have not heard the Secretary of State say that, and if he believes it to be a new condition, I am surprised that he has not been better briefed. My colleagues and I have often mentioned the issue in the House, so there is nothing new about it.

We are now reaching a stage at which we want to make very clear the particulars of what giving support to the police, and to our judicial system, means in Northern Ireland. I trust that those with aspirations to be in Government recognise that it would be inconsistent with that position to be part of an organisation that does not recognise the courts, and will not recognise or support the police. Even worse, a policy document from Sinn Fein that we received fairly recently did not merely suggest that Sinn Fein did not support the police, but argued that its members should go out and protest against them actively. There is a long road to travel.

I think that that demonstrates how difficult it will be for people to come to terms with the devolution of policing and justice powers, and why it will be necessary for Sinn Fein in particular to convince the community in Northern Ireland that it supports law and order and wants the police to be able to operate freely in all parts of Northern Ireland.

Dr. McCrea: As my hon. Friend will know, reports from the Independent Monitoring Commission and from those on the ground acknowledge the existence of a continuing serious threat from the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA. Does he accept that anyone holding ministerial office in any Executive will have to support the police force in the execution of its duty, and support the forces of law and order in the defeat of terrorism? Terrorism has been the scourge of Northern Ireland for so many years that we cannot be ambivalent about the future.

Mr. Robinson: I do indeed accept that. Difficult decisions would have to be made if Sinn Fein did support the police. It would have to be asked whether the community were confident that policing and justice powers had been devolved, and whether Sinn Fein should have any role in that. I cannot envisage such circumstances, but my hon. Friend tempts me to consider what situation Sinn Fein might face. It might well face the situation faced by a Minister in the Republic—in the Home Office, or whatever it was called in those days—who, having been in the Provisional IRA, had to line up some of his former colleagues who had continued in the war after he had taken up his democratic position, and have them shot. There would be hard decisions for any member of Sinn Fein to take in those circumstances, but I must point out to my hon. Friend that I cannot envisage them arising immediately.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): Is it not a fact that Mr. De Valera had to do the same with his own people? Did not the first Prime Minister of the Irish Republic make a statement in which he said that there cannot be two police forces or two armies? He said that one police force—the police force of the state—was to be recognised, and that all others were to be rejected, and that if they were not rejected by the people, they, as the Government, would reject them and remove them.

Mr. Robinson: My right hon. Friend is correct, and that is the position that the Government of the Irish Republic adopt to this day. Indeed, it is one reason that the Justice Minister of the Irish Republic, Michael McDowell, gave for not countenancing Sinn Fein's participation in government. He said that, while they retain a link with the Provisional IRA, one could not have two armies in the Irish Republic. However, there is a certain hypocrisy on the part of the Irish Republic, in that they are expecting us to do something that they are not prepared to do.

The intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) reminds me of The Irish Times article by Dermot Ahern, which was immensely insulting to the community in Northern Ireland. In essence, he said that these principles can be applied to us, but that they certainly cannot be applied in the Irish Republic. The attitude was, "Anything is good enough for those people up there." The general attitude adopted by the Irish Republic's foreign affairs Minister seemed to be, "We cannot have Sinn Fein in government, but those people up there should have them because they do not have a normal society." They could not allow Sinn Fein to have any responsibility for policing but, of course, we can. However, if we are coming out of conflict, the need for stable institutions is all the greater. It is all the more important for people to have confidence in our security forces, the police and the justice system.

So policing is a critical issue, which is why the Minister, in providing these enabling powers, should not get carried away with the prospect of their being taken up immediately. His offer might lie on the table for some time. That said, I do welcome the further option that he provides in amendment No. 3, which allows the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to create a policing and justice department—set up by their nominee—if the proposal is supported by a cross-community vote in the Assembly. That is another option; however, no one knows whether that or any of the other options will be taken up. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) could well be right: a new idea might arise in the weeks, months and years before this event comes about, and the Government may well have to come back with more legislation.

[Mr. Peter Robinson]

I would be more content if the Government focused on what is possible, rather than on what is practically impossible at the moment. I welcome the prospect of the Northern Ireland Assembly being brought out of suspension, if events go as well as the Government and my colleagues and I hope. Although the Assembly created under the 2006 legislation is not running, it is certainly up. I trust that the position of the Social, Democratic and Labour party—which is willing to participate, to discuss these issues and to put them before the Government—will be taken on board, because it is largely the same as that adopted by me and my colleagues. We do not want to be part of a talking shop. That said, we do want to talk about these issues and to reach agreement on them, but we will point out to the Government that if an agreement is reached, they must ensure that the wishes of the elected representatives in Northern Ireland are implemented in respect not just of the issues before us, but of wider issues.

Mr. Dodds: I want to make one or two brief points. We have discussed a wide range of issues in some detail. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) painted various scenarios in convoluted detail, some of which were extremely hypothetical, and which may or may not come about. He painted an unhappy picture of extreme deviousness and lack of trust—not that that is uncommon, perhaps, in politics. If such safeguards as he described have to be implemented, that suggests that the devolution of policing and justice will never come about. He referred, in the context of appointing a Speaker, to Caesar doing in Brutus, although today we perhaps have Cleopatra in the Chair of the Northern Ireland Assembly. It appears that, in the process of deciding who should occupy the Chair, there would be a complete blood-bath.

That does not bear thinking about, but we should all be reassured by the fact that the scenario that we are contemplating today is extremely unlikely. My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) said that it is not likely to happen in his lifetime, and I agree that it is extremely unlikely that the circumstances will be such that the people of Northern Ireland will be sufficiently confident to contemplate allowing a party such as Sinn Fein—or, indeed, the Progressive Unionist party—anywhere near justice and policing in Northern Ireland. We must bear that point in mind during this debate.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman says that it will be a long time before the community in Northern Ireland contemplates Sinn Fein's being involved in policing and justice. Does he think that that is true even if a Sinn Fein representative were serving as Deputy First Minister?

Mr. Dodds: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that perhaps gets to the core of this issue. As has been pointed out, we have emphasised in recent days that support for law and order and the police must be demonstrated not just by joining the Policing Board. We must remember that Sinn Fein joined the Northern Ireland Executive while they were quite prepared to undermine democracy and government. Signing up to the Executive did not make them democrats, and signing up to the Policing Board does not make them supporters of the police. Before they can be considered fit for office—be it in policing and justice, or any in other position—they must support all aspects of policing and urge people to give information to the police. They must also do so in a credible way, instead of simply issuing a statement that enables them to clear a particular hurdle. I hope that that is clear.

I am somewhat concerned by the attitude that Ministers from the Prime Minister downward are adopting on this issue. They seem to be saying that this is a new precondition, but it is not. If someone is committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means and says that there has to be a complete end to criminality, ipso facto, they have to support police. If they are against criminality but do not support the police, in effect, they are saying, "We'll organise the stamping out of criminality, through the structures and organisations that we have in place." That is unacceptable in a democratic society, and it is certainly an unacceptable view for any party that aspires to be in government.

Mark Durkan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I hope that he can help us further. He pointed out that the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) said earlier that we might not see devolution of justice and policing in his lifetime, particularly if there is a Sinn Fein Minister. However, the hon. Gentleman did not say the same about the prospect of a Sinn Fein member becoming Deputy First Minister. He also said that he could not see a First Minister and Deputy First Minister appointing anybody other than people from their own parties. So will the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) please clarify the relationship between the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and the devolution of policing and justice in that regard?

Mr. Dodds: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question, but my hon. Friend made it clear that when he was talking about who would be First Minister and Deputy First Minister, he was doing so in the context of the legislation before us and the various scenarios that might arise. He also made it clear, as has our party, that the prospects of reaching that situation, in which we would consider proposals for the Northern Ireland Assembly on the issue of devolution of policing and justice, are remote. In fact, they are so remote that it is difficult to envisage when it might happen.

As for the holding of ministerial office, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and the Prime Minister has said that parties that want to take part in the government of Northern Ireland should support the policing, but that those are matters for the medium term and which must be worked on or must happen—as if we can somehow expect that to happen in due course, in parallel with the Executive being up and running. That will not wash.

3 pm

My hon. Friend mentioned the remarks by Dermot Ahern, the Irish Foreign Minister. It is completely unacceptable for him to tell people in Northern Ireland that he would not share power with Sinn Fein in the Republic because it does not support the Garda Siochana, but that it is acceptable for it to be in government in Northern Ireland because we have been in a conflict situation. Our people, our constituents, our kith and kin have been murdered and butchered by the people who Dermot Ahern says are acceptable as Government Ministers, and they still do not support the police. What sort of message does that send to the people of Northern Ireland?

Dermot Ahern said in effect that it was acceptable for Sinn Fein not to support the police because all the recommendations of the Patten report have not been implemented. He was pressed on which recommendations he meant, and he said that Sinn Fein had not signed up. I am sure that the SDLP was not very grateful for those comments. It was diplomatic in its response, in public, but I am sure that it has let the Irish Government know how it feels.

In those remarks, Dermot Ahern effectively told Sinn Fein, "It's okay, you don't have to sign up to policing and justice, or give your support to the police. We accept your position of being in government but not supporting the police." That is a very dangerous situation, and the Government should be aware that this is a matter of fundamental importance to all the people of Northern Ireland. That is why the decision, in that context, of the Ulster Unionist party to embrace the PUP as a formal part of its party structure in the Assembly has such incredible implications for the political process in Northern Ireland. I welcome what the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) has put on record today, but the reason that her party leader gave her in private conversation is not the reason he gave publicly at the time, or in the Assembly. He said that he had done it purely as a power grab, to grab an extra ministry. In fact, if he had waited, he would not have needed to do that at all. He has got all the pain, with no gain whatever.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does my hon. Friend agree that we are getting into dangerous territory? The Government are bypassing the conditions that were laid down by the Prime Minister in this very House. A statement has been issued by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that the UUP's decision to subsume Mr. Ervine was "a surprise", but a matter for the parties. I do not know what he means by that. What parties? He also said that Sinn Fein was in a "much stronger position" to be on the Executive since the IRA had decommissioned. He said:

"The UVF have not ended their paramilitary campaign...They are still involved in criminality in a big way and all of those things are things which the IRA have promised to deliver on and is delivering on."

That is giving a green light to two parties to keep on their way. They cannot do what the Prime Minister said that they would do and still be in government and appoint people to office.

Mr. Dodds: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for drawing the House's attention to those significant remarks by the Secretary of State today. Is it not amazing that the Secretary of State can reveal that, in his estimation, Sinn Fein is more qualified for government—or is nearer to being qualified—than the UUP, with its formal links to the PUP? Who would have thought that that would happen? Reg Empey and the UUP will have to grapple with that issue. They have added considerable volatility to the situation, as we approach whatever deadline may be arriving.

There will be no double standards from this party. We have made our position clear on the entry into government of parties associated with terrorism and violence. I would have hoped that having made an issue of IRA decommissioning, Reg Empey would have taken that same position consistently, but sadly those hopes have been dashed.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Is my hon. Friend aware that one of his constituents, Mr. Raymond McCord, whose son was murdered by the UVF, met the leader of the UUP on Monday morning? Before that meeting, another UUP Assembly Member, Mr. Copeland from East Belfast, made an offer to Mr. McCord of the use of an office if he would keep quiet and not criticise the decision. The UUP is now into bribing victims. Is my hon. Friend also aware that Mr. McCord was informed by Sir Reg Empey that David Ervine was the third MLA that he had approached about signing up to their group, the other two having rejected—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should relate their remarks to the new clause.

Mr. Dodds: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. In considering the clauses, which relate to the conditions under which policing and justice powers may be devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly at some point in the future, it is important and relevant to consider the parties involved and the conditions that they have to meet. In that context, the Secretary of State's comments today, referred to by my right hon. Friend, are significant. The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) is also significant. I know Raymond McCord, he is one of my constituents and I have spoken to him on many occasions. I am aware of the hurt and the pain that he and his family have gone through as the result of the death of his son at the hands of the UVF, and many other people have been in touch with our party to express their utter revulsion at the latest development with the UUP. The suggestion that the UUP, through Mr. Copeland, would attempt to bribe Mr. McCord into silence adds another dimension of revulsion, and it poses serious questions about the judgment of that party.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell: I hesitate to waste time, but I wish to set the record straight. Mr. Raymond McCord is one of my constituents: he lives on Purdysburn hill, near Newtownbreda. The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) has misled the Chamber.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should think carefully about the words that he has just used. He may wish to reframe his remarks.

Dr. McDonnell: I withdraw what I said.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I hope that hon. Members will be a little more precise in their remarks about the new clause.

Mr. Dodds: For the vast bulk of the time, Mr. McCord has been a constituent in Belfast, North. Certainly, his son was murdered while he was living there.

In conclusion, these new clauses touch on wider political issues. As I said in my intervention on the hon. Member for Foyle, we could spend a long time on minutiae and mechanics and lose the context of what we are discussing. The latter part of the debate has focused on the real political issues at stake. There has been much talk about locks, triple locks, and quadruple locks. Some people will be on the side of the locksmiths and will try to build in safeguards, while others will be on the side of those who want to pick the lock and sneak into Government by the back door.

We are on the side of the locksmiths and are building in safeguards. I am glad that the new clause means that we will have, not the triple lock that my party called for originally, but a quadruple lock. That quadruple lock requires the approval of the Secretary of State and this House, and the 50:50:50 approval of the Northern Ireland Assembly. I welcome that, for precisely the reason that the leader of the SDLP does not—it changes the Belfast agreement. Moreover, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister have to agree before any proposal can be brought forward.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I had not intended to take part in the debate, but I have listened with considerable interest to speeches that have been rather longer than were originally promised. I completely understand that and you, Madam Deputy Speaker, have been very generous in allowing a wide-ranging debate on the new clause. I hope that it does not sound patronising if I say that I think that you have been right to do so. Events have taken place in the Province this week that cast a shadow, and hon. Members were bound to refer to them. I thank you very much for allowing them to do so.

I support the new clause because, in essence, it is impeccable. The Government are saying that in no circumstances should matters of policing and justice be devolved unless there is a credible and virtually unanimous wish across the Province, encapsulated by the agreement of the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the nationalist and Unionist communities, that that should happen. All of that is right, and I applaud the Minister for bringing the new clause forward.

I listened with mounting perplexity to the long speech from the leader of the SDLP, which certainly deserves to earn him a doctorate in Machiavellian studies. He set out so many conditions and preconditions, and anticipated so many difficulties, that the Minister was right to resist his blandishments.

The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) referred earlier to last week's appearance by Secretary of State before the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee. It is always an interesting session when he comes before the Committee, and last week was no exception. He always treats the Committee with total courtesy, and is an extremely effective witness, but he did rather equivocate last week.

One after another, hon. Members asked whether the acceptance of the rule of law and support for the police should not be preconditions of participation in government. The transcript shows that the Secretary of State did not give an unequivocal and binding answer, yet the new clause contains just such a commitment—[Interruption.] It would be nice to have the attention of all those from the Province.

The new clause says that matters of policing and justice cannot be devolved without the agreement about which there has been much discussion and which the DUP support very strongly. On the other hand, it makes it clear that people will be allowed into government and positions of executive responsibility who do not accept the rule of law or support the policing of the Province.

That is a remarkable and frankly indefensible paradox, and I beg the Minister to talk to the Secretary of State about it. There will be an opportunity to debate the matter in greater detail later this afternoon, although I shall not necessarily take part. That is why I making some relevant remarks now.

3.15 pm

We cannot cherry-pick in the way that is proposed if we are to have a proper and credible Assembly in Northern Ireland, with an Executive who can command widespread and lasting support. To establish proper normality in the Province, we must remember what government means, and insist absolutely that it is upheld by those who participate in it. People cannot uphold government if they do not uphold the rule of law, and they cannot do that unless they uphold those who are given responsibility for keeping the peace.

I hope that the debate will lead to a bit of a rethink, and that the Secretary of State will give us an absolute assurance that cherry-picking will end. I hope that a welcome will be extended to people who change their views and foreswear criminality. It is impossible to forget, but there must be a willingness to draw a line in respect of the past. The absolute requirement, however, is that the people, with executive responsibility in government sign up to the rule of law, absolutely and completely. That must be accepted totally if matters to do with justice and policing are ever to be devolved.

Until such matters are devolved, we will not have a proper devolved Government in the Province. That is why it is essential that we move towards the acceptance that I have described. The Government are right to insist on the preconditions in new clause 3, and I applaud them for bringing that provision forward, but I also implore them to accept the logic of the argument implicit in it. There can be no fudge over the next six months that causes us to land up with an Assembly that has built-in obsolescence from the day of its first meeting.

I am one of those who are concerned about the future of the Province of Northern Ireland. We want it to be treated with the same degree of respect as Wales, Scotland and England, and to enjoy the same degree of normality that obtains in those countries. That is why we must insist that there can be no fudge in this matter. That is crucially important.

I support what the Minister is asking the House to agree to this afternoon, and I do so without any equivocation whatsoever. However, the Government must be equally unequivocal in the demands that they make on those who would aspire to Government in the Province.

Dr. McCrea: The heading for the new clause is "Conditions for devolving policing and justice matters". My colleagues who have spoken in the debate have made it abundantly clear that, for us, there can be no new conditions. The conditions for the devolution of policing and justice matters are also the conditions for a devolved Government, which are, as we have said so many times before, that there must be not only a complete and absolute end to terrorism with a renunciation of terrorism and all acts of terrorism, but a complete and final turning away from criminal activities and a renunciation of them. That includes those who still live on the rewards of crime. We do not close our hearts and minds to a fact that many people have forgotten: £20 million is still in the hands of the Provisionals. We cannot allow people to continue to live on the fruit of their past criminal activity.

We are making no new conditions for the devolution of policing and justice matters; the conditions for any democratic society are that everyone must uphold the rule of law and support those who exercise it in the Province on behalf of Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Government. There can be no fuel laundering, no money laundering, no extortion, no intimidation and no continuation of the wide range of criminal activity that the Provisional IRA and Sinn Fein-IRA have so successfully carried out for so many years. We demand an absolute end to such activity. I want to make it clear that this is not a new condition laid down by the Democratic Unionist party; it is a statement of our position right from the beginning. We shall not change our principles for the Government or anyone else; we shall not sacrifice the principles of a democratic society.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I say with pride that I am delighted that my hon. Friend has allowed me to intervene. For many years, I have taken an active and positive interest in Northern Ireland. Does he accept that the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), as Chairman of the Northern Ireland Committee, were absolutely right? There can be no devolved Government unless all parties in Northern Ireland accept the rule of law and recognise the police and justice in the Province. Without that, there can be no meaningful devolved Government in Northern Ireland who will encourage the involvement of all its peoples.

Dr. McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. For many years, both he and his good wife, the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), have indeed had the interests of Northern Ireland at heart. I wholeheartedly agree that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) exactly set out the principles of democracy, but I do not accept that terrorists should hold up devolved Government in Northern Ireland. The Social Democratic and Labour party should have the imagination and vision to join the rest of us in a devolved, cross-community Government who ostracise those who carry on criminal and terrorist activity.

We have constantly suggested to the SDLP that there could be a voluntary coalition among true democrats in Northern Ireland. That would give great heart to the people of Northern Ireland and would be a positive way forward. If the SDLP ties itself to the likes of Sinn Fein-IRA, it will be tying itself to a broken stick. Sinn Fein-IRA have proved that they are not democrats working in accordance with the principles of democracy—they are not, therefore, meeting the conditions.

The rest of us—the people of Northern Ireland—should not be tied by criminals and terrorists. True democrats should stand shoulder to shoulder, side by side, and give the people hope and a visionary way forward that will give us a good devolved Government who are not undermined by the constant threat of whether their members will be involved in terrorist atrocity or whether another stash of arms will be found. We need stable government, and the conditions for devolving policing and justice matters are the same as those that will establish truly acceptable, democratic devolved government in Northern Ireland.

We in the DUP want to see that day; we want it for the good of the people of Northern Ireland, but there is one price that we will not pay. We are not willing to undermine the principles of democracy. If we do that, the foundations will be rotten and, as I have said so many times, a house built on sand will surely fall when the day of testing comes. My Saviour set out that principle when he talked about the house built on sand. The house that will withstand every test is the house built on rock. Our foundation must be the rock of democracy and we will accept nothing less. We must have those conditions, which is why I am happy to support everything that my right hon. and hon. Friends have said in the debate. I trust that the Secretary of State will get the message. We are not moving one iota from the principles we have set out in the past.

Mr. Hanson: We have debated the new clause for about an hour and 45 minutes, but I think that there is an element of consensus among Members. The issues set out in the amendments have received a welcome from DUP Members—the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds). The Chairman of the Northern Ireland Committee, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) welcomed the principal Government amendments and there has been no opposition to them from my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan). There is a general consensus that our amendments will help to secure support in due course for the devolution of policing and criminal justice in Northern Ireland.

Mark Durkan: Will the Minister take a correction? I do not want to cause problems or difficulties, but we certainly do not support the Government's principal amendment.

Mr. Hanson: Perhaps I was too hopeful of the circumstances, but there has been an element of consensus in today's debate. At times, given the number of times that locks have been mentioned, I feel that I am in the possession of more locks than Chubb at the moment, but we make progress.

The principle behind all this remains the same as the principle that I elucidated in my opening comments: can we get a position whereby the Assembly has the opportunity to consider whether it wishes policing and criminal justice to be devolved? I believe that the amendments provide an opportunity for rational consideration, which gives the opportunity for cross-community support and empowers to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to propose that support to ensure that the Assembly has its full consideration. Again, I am in danger of repeating myself, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, or his successor, must then agree to that proposal and would bring it to the House for its endorsement.

I fully accept that all the points mentioned by the hon. Members for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), for Belfast, East, for Belfast, North, for South Staffordshire and, indeed, others have pointed to the fact that there is still a range of difficulties that relate to the conditions being right for the process to commence, but I do not know whether or not that will happen in the lifetime of the hon. Member for Belfast, East. I wish I knew how long he will live; I am sure that he will have a long and happy life. However, the key conditions are there to allow that mechanism to begin when that confidence is in place.

3.30 pm

I recognise that there are many difficulties and I am in danger of straying into discussing later amendments on the rule of law, which I am happy to debate now, and there are real issues about the definitions. We have tabled further amendments for later in consideration, but I repeat what I have said in the House previously: the Government, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I wish to see Sinn Fein sign up to policing and to support policing operations in Northern Ireland. That is a key element in building the confidence that hon. Members wish to see, and I certainly urge those hon. Members from Sinn Fein who are not in the House today to consider that proposal in considering these matters in the House and elsewhere. It is important that they support the police for reasons that are self-evident to every hon. Member who sits in the House today.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Rather than being a key element, should not the Minister use the words "absolute requirement"?

Mr. Hanson: We will debate these matters in due course. If the hon. Gentleman, who holds the distinguished position of Chairman of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, looks, as I know that he has done, at the pledge of office that is in place for Ministers, he will see that the very points that he makes are intrinsic in that. [HON. MEMBERS: "They are not."] Let me finish the point. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has done, I have also said that, as part of the discussions on the way forward for the Assembly, the question of discussion on the pledge of office is open for consideration, and a strengthening of that pledge of office could be considered in due course by the Assembly and by the Government.

Mr. Dodds: Is that it?

Mr. Hanson: I simply say that I recognise the concerns that hon. Members have raised today. We will have an opportunity later to discuss those concerns in more detail, and I am in danger of drifting into issues that are important in relation to these clauses but are subject to further amendment later in the day.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am very interested in what the Minister has said. I should like him to tell the House, and to read it out, where the police are mentioned in the undertaking that he says that the new Ministers all had to take.

Mr. Hanson: Perhaps I can help the right hon. Gentleman. The pledge of office that all Ministers must affirm in the Assembly before taking up posts already requires a commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means. Amendments made in 2003 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998 facilitate the consideration of the Independent Monitoring Commission's recommendations and provides safeguards where Ministers and parties fail to observe the pledge of office. As I have said, the pledge of office, as currently constituted, provides for adherence to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. As we have already made clear, if the parties want to change the pledge of office and they can agree on a form of words in the context of an agreement on a package of other strand 1 issues, I am certainly willing to take those matters forward.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am trying to be helpful. What I should like is a pledge that says, "I unreservedly uphold the rule of law and give my total and absolute support to those who are commissioned to protect the public in the police."

Mr. Hanson: Again, we are in danger of going into debates that we will have later—I am happy to do that—but as I said in Committee, the principle of supporting policing and the rule of law is something that I wish to uphold. I wish to see that happen, and I have no problem with that. However, as I have said during the course of the debate, it is possible for a Minister to have disagreements with the police and there is a whole range of circumstances in which a Minister could exercise judgment in those disagreements. I agree with the substance of what hon. Members are saying, but it is difficult to put things in the form that the later amendments do. We are in danger of having a debate about later amendments and I do not wish to incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Sammy Wilson: Does the Minister accept that we are not talking about having disagreements with the police? We are talking about a party that discourages people from having any contact with the police or giving the police any evidence or support to tackle crime. That is totally different.

Mr. Hanson: I want that full support for the police to be visualised in an operational way by support from all parties for policing. I want Sinn Fein to take places on the Policing Board, as does the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins). I want to see that support. However, there are specific reasons why the Government cannot accept the phraseology of later amendments.

I want to refocus the debate on the fact that there is an element of consensus among Members here today. I welcome the welcome of my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle for the proposals that I have made in response to the concerns that he put to me in Committee. However—I mean this in the nicest possible way—there is a danger that the amendments that he has tabled will mean that we will not just micro-manage some of the circumstances, but micro-micro-manage them. I understand and have some sympathy with what he has said, in that everything that he has mentioned in support of his amendments is accurate and relates to things that could occur. However, I am trying to envisage circumstances in which they would. What I am saying is genuinely intended to help him. He talked about d'Hondt. It is true that a justice Minister counts as a d'Hondt post, but if a Minister resigns or is dismissed and a new Minister is appointed, d'Hondt would be run again. The Bill already provides for that. So, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister cannot gain extra seats by dismissing Ministers from other parties in the way that he has suggested.

Again, I understand the possibilities but, as even the hon. Members for Belfast, East and for Belfast, North recognised, we are discussing things that may or may not ever occur. I accept that they could occur and that everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle said is possible. I will certainly reflect on those things. If other parties feel that we need to micro-micro-manage those issues, I am happy to reflect on those points in another place. I am trying to put in place a broad framework that will mean that devolution can take place and we have the mechanisms in place to put in the locks to which we have all referred. Although we can certainly adopt the principles of what has been said, I do not necessarily wish to micro-manage at that level of detail the possibilities that exist, but if other parties wish to do so I am happy to reflect on those points.

Mark Durkan: I just want to correct the Minister. If a vacancy arises by dismissal, resignation or some other means in the Justice Ministry, as created under the Bill, it is not the case that there is an automatic re-run of d'Hondt—because, after all, the appointments are not d'Hondt appointments—any more than if a Minister resigns under d'Hondt or a party resigns on bloc under d'Hondt that forces a total rerun of d'Hondt. It does not.

Mr. Hanson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution, but my understanding, and that of my officials who are concerned with this matter, is as I have just outlined to the House. His understanding appears to be different. There are issues on which we fundamentally disagree, but this is an issue on which I am just looking at the practicalities of the level of micro-management. I think that what I have said is the correct position; he may have a different interpretation. However, in both cases we are talking about situations that may occur in which, in effect, the First and Deputy First Ministers potentially would have to rat on their own parties as well. I am just looking at the mechanics of all this and trying to envisage circumstances in which such a thing could happen. My hon. Friend's points undoubtedly have an element of validity, but I cannot envisage such circumstances. I would be grateful if he would not press his amendments to a Division. I will be happy to reflect on them with officials, and if other parties have views they can put them forward.

I do not wish to comment in detail on a matter that several hon. Members have mentioned in passing, but I will put a couple of points on the record. There has been discussion about the relationship between the PUP and UUP and the announcements that were made. As I said before you took the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the matter is subject to legal discussion regarding the Assembly Speaker's recognition of the UUP-PUP grouping as a party for Assembly purposes. She is likely to make a ruling later this week. I have heard what has been said about the political elements of the situation, but it would be inappropriate for me to comment in detail on the legality of the situation because that will be subject to the Speaker's ruling in the Assembly.

Given what has been said about the politics of any relationship, it is important that the Secretary of State has undertaken today to recognise the fact that the republican movement has taken steps. Admittedly, for some parties it has not gone far enough to move away from the violence that has occurred. Although there is more work to be done, the Independent Monitoring Commission reports indicate that the republican movement has taken serious steps to move away from criminality.

What the Secretary of State has said today emphasises the importance of loyalist paramilitaries undertaking to go down the same route. It is not acceptable for me or the Secretary of State that a situation exists in which there is officially no ceasefire from loyalist paramilitaries. I ask both loyalist paramilitaries and dissident republicans—the Continuity IRA and Real IRA, which were mentioned by the hon. Member for South Antrim—to abandon immediately their activities that lead to potential terrorism, threats and murder. That was the point that the Secretary of State was making. The relationships between political parties in the Assembly are a matter for those parties and the legal judgment of the Assembly Speaker.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I would like to put it on the record that when the Secretary of State came before the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee last week, no one was more rigorous in questioning him about loyalist paramilitaries and their nefarious deeds than the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon).

Mr. Hanson: I pay tribute to the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) for the work that she has done. On individual cases, such as that of her constituent Lisa Dorrian, she has been relentless in her pursuit of not only justice, but condemnation, which is a key matter than she holds dear to her heart.

Dr. McCrea: There is not a potential threat from Continuity IRA or Real IRA. A bomb was primed in Londonderry and was headed, we believe, towards a police station. A bomb was being set in Lurgan. That was not a potential threat, but an active, real threat that terrorists were posing against the law-abiding people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanson: I trust that the hon. Gentleman knows that I share his concern and condemnation. I also know that the bomb threats that occurred in the constituencies of my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle and the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) were real and serious threats from dissident republicans. Again, to put the point into context in relation to the amendments, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was indicating that the republican movement has taken steps towards a more peaceful road. There is still work to be done, but there is clear intent and clear movement. The Secretary of State issued a challenge, with the words that the right hon. Member for North Antrim read to the House, to the dissident republican movement and the loyalist movement to take the same path.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The quotation that my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) put on the record went beyond that. Does the Minister agree with the Secretary of State in his indication that Sinn Fein is now in a stronger position to be in an Executive than the Ulster Unionist party?

3.45 pm

Mr. Hanson: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have been in the Chamber and have not been able to see the Secretary of State's words. It is my intention, and my view, that we should continue to welcome the movement by republicans towards a more peaceful road and that we should condemn the actions of dissident republicans and loyalist paramilitaries in the threat—potential, real or otherwise—that they pose to the community. I will not be satisfied in this post, and nor will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who is responsible for security, until such time as we have a definitive ceasefire from the loyalists and the dissident republicans, and verification of that by the IMC in due course.

With the possible exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle, there is an element of consensus on the Government amendments. I appreciate the welcome from the hon. Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and for Belfast, North. I also appreciate my hon. Friend's welcome for the assistance that I gave him.

Lady Hermon: Will the Minister clear up one issue raised by the Secretary of State in evidence to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee last week? In the context of the Bill, he said:

> "I think there will be rightly increased pressure on Sinn Fein to deliver their end in terms of commitments. That is to say, once the Bill has received Royal Assent there is then no reason for them not to move on policing, and I think they will."

What exactly did he mean by saying that Sinn Fein will move on to policing once the Bill receives Royal Assent?

Mr. Hanson: Again, there are two aspects of policy to consider. I believe that my right hon. Friend—and, potentially, Sinn Fein—want police and criminal justice devolved to the Assembly in due course. For that to happen, for the reasons that we all know, my right hon. Friend and I want Sinn Fein to be involved in supporting policing, because policing, criminal justice and the rule of law in the broader sense are central and essential to the democratic society in Northern Ireland, as they are elsewhere.

We should continue to encourage Sinn Fein to work towards playing its full part on the Policing Board and in supporting the police in their community. I recognise that we are not there yet, but I am very hopeful, as is my new colleague, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, that we will do that over time. Ultimately, I want devolution to take place, but I recognise, on all these matters, that it will only take place with the confidence of both sides of the community. I have put in place mechanisms in the amendments so that if Sinn Fein and others in the nationalist community sign up to policing and the conditions arise to devolve criminal justice and policing in due course, that will be done if the Assembly, along with the Secretary of the State and the House, want it.

Rev. Ian Paisley: What the people of Northern Ireland will wonder about is the Secretary of State's statement that the Ulster Unionist party is now in a weaker position than Sinn Fein. He knows very well that the IMC report was unequivocal in its condemnation of the Ulster Volunteer Force. Three paragraphs of the report spell out that it is a terrorist body and is engaged in terrorism. How, then, can he say that there is a difference between the activity of Sinn Fein and the activity of the UVF, and that because the official Unionist party has gone into a coalition with the UVF spokesman, it is in a weaker position? We cannot balance aspects of terrorism. Terrorism is terrorism. It is not possible to say that one part is a bit weaker than another. How do we get over that problem?

Mr. Hanson: If I may say so, the right hon. Gentleman has been entirely consistent in his condemnation of violence and terrorism. The points that he has made over the past few days have confirmed that consistency. I would simply say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State believes that the republican movement, in the broadest sense, is moving towards a more peaceful route, has been verified by the IMC to that effect and is undertaking moves that, I hope, will lead to the restoration of the Assembly. I have not seen his remarks, but my understanding of what he said today is that there needs to be the same movement from Continuity IRA and Real IRA, the dissident republicans, and there needs to be the same movement from those loyalist groups that are currently not on ceasefire and are undertaking activity that has led to the deaths of a number of individuals over the 12 months that I have held this office. I condemn all violence and all that paramilitary activity. I want to see an end to it, as I know do hon. Members on all sides of the House. The Government are working towards that end.

We have had a very wide debate. I go back to the amendments and the new clause that are before us. I think that there is the potential for reasonable consensus on these matters. I hope that we have given greater strength to the Assembly's powers to have cross-community support, that we have given extra models, which my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle has requested, and that we have put in place a mechanism that will ensure that if the Assembly wishes to devolve in due course, it has strong powers to do so. I commend my new clause and amendments to the House and I ask hon. Members not to press their amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 2

CRIMINAL DAMAGE (COMPENSATION) (NORTHERN IRELAND) ORDER 1977 AMENDMENT

'After subsection 4(a) of the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977 there is inserted—

"Any building to which Article 12 of the Rates (Capital Values, etc.) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 applies.".'.—[Mr. Dodds.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Dodds: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The purpose of the new clause is to ensure that buildings to which article 12 of the Rates (Capital Values, etc.) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 applies come under subsection 4, as opposed to subsection 5, of the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977. Community halls, Orange halls, halls used by the Ancient Order of Hibernians and other types of hall recently gained exemption from rates in Northern Ireland. That move was widely welcomed throughout the community as beneficial for local communities. It relieved a major financial burden for those who run such halls on both sides of the community: on the Unionist side and on the nationalist side. Under the new clause, those halls would also be subject to subsection 4 of the criminal damage compensation provisions, rather than subsection 5. That would bring them into line with agricultural premises.

Other properties have to prove, for the purposes of getting compensation from the Northern Ireland Office, that three or more people were involved in an attack or commission of an offence that resulted in damage to premises, or the Chief Constable has to issue a certificate indicating that it was carried out by a proscribed organisation. Agricultural premises, on the other hand, are not subject to such stringent provisions. In that case, if the act is deemed to have been carried out maliciously or wantonly, that alone is the condition that applies and compensation is payable.

Through their recent derating provisions, the Government have recognised the valuable role played by the halls that we are talking about—community halls, Orange halls, halls used by those in the nationalist community. They provide an invaluable community resource. That applies to urban areas, but it is particularly applicable to rural areas. Lest we run away with the idea that the proposal would only benefit people who run those halls, many of them, like parish halls throughout the United Kingdom, are used for a wide range of purposes. In Northern Ireland, they are used by credit unions, community groups and youth services for a vast array of community activities, and their use has expanded a great deal in recent years. The removal of a large financial burden following the introduction of derating was welcomed in Northern Ireland, and I congratulate the Government on taking on board the proposal, which we pressed strongly in our discussions and negotiations with them.

Insurance is even more financially crippling for those halls than the rates levied on them. Orange halls often make their own provision, which is very costly, because many insurance companies refuse to offer cover for community halls, particularly Orange halls. The cover that is available is extremely expensive, because of the number and extent of sectarian attacks suffered by the halls and the problems that they face in obtaining compensation for such attacks. Sometimes, people seeking insurance for an Orange hall approached more than 30 different companies before finding one that provides cover, and even then at an exorbitant price. They sometimes have to pay four-figure sums for insurance that would cost £100 or £150 in Scotland and England, which is a massive difference. There have been dozens of sectarian attacks in recent years, particularly on Orange halls, which have suffered extensive damage and, in many cases, been razed to the ground. Those attacks are usually carried out in the dead of night, with few witnesses, and they deprive a local community of an invaluable resource.

Lady Hermon: I support very strongly the new clause tabled by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues. He will have noticed that the Minister expressed support for the Government document, "A Shared Future". Would it not be helpful if the Government did not just talk the talk but walked the walk and supported the proposal, which usefully acknowledges the traditions and cultures not just of the Orange Order but of the Ancient Order of Hibernian?

Mr. Dodds: I very much welcome the hon. Lady's support. She is quite right. The case for the halls has been made, and the argument has been won, as evidenced by the fact that the Government decided exceptionally to introduce derating for the halls only a few months ago. The principle and precedent have been established: the new clause would simply remove a major financial burden that has an even greater impact than rates, so I hope that the Minister has it in his gift to respond positively to the proposal.

Mr. Peter Robinson: My hon. Friend is making a powerful case—one so compelling that no reasonable Minister could resist it. The fact that compensation is not paid after halls are destroyed makes them all the more a target. In the sectarian attacks that have taken place, there is the knowledge that the responsibility and the cost will be borne directly by the Orangemen or the Ancient Order of Hibernians concerned. That makes it much more attractive because the perpetrators know the pain that will result from the attack.

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend has highlighted a significant aspect. Those who carry out the attacks see that they are hurting the Orange community directly. Those who attack other halls on the nationalist side are doing the same on that side. They are impacting directly on the community. That, as my hon. Friend points out, provides an incentive for further attacks. There is no greater incentive for the arsonists, vandals and hooligans who carry out the attacks than to see halls that they have attacked previously lying derelict and, in some cases, razed to the ground for months and in many cases years on end, as people struggle to get compensation from their insurers, if they have insurers, or from the Northern Ireland Office, which refuses to provide insurance. They have to resort to raising the funds themselves, which in many cases is virtually impossible.

The way that the system operates is an incentive for arsonists to go on attacking isolated halls. I should draw the attention of the House to the areas affected. I have a list of the arson attacks on Orange halls. I do not have a complete list of all the halls that have been attacked throughout Northern Ireland, but last year there were attacks on three Orange halls in County Tyrone, two in County Down, another one in County Tyrone, one in County Antrim, one in Armagh, two in Belfast and another one in Armagh. The attacks are widespread throughout the Province and are having a major impact on local communities.

Dr. McCrea: The list that my hon. Friend read out reflects the fact that the halls often represent a small, and in the local area a minority, community. Local people therefore are not able to pay for the rebuilding of the hall. My hon. Friend mentioned halls that were attacked in Tyrone. Those were isolated Protestant communities in a large nationalist or republican area. The attack on the hall was an attack on the culture of a small minority community.

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend is right. Halls that have been targeted—for example, in Castlederg, Strabane, Altnaveigh in Newry, and Whiterock in Belfast, near my constituency—are all situated in areas where the Protestant Unionist community is very much in the minority. That is a feature of the preponderance of attacks that have taken place, though it is not exclusively the case. They are seen as attacks on vulnerable communities, depriving them of what is for many of them their only local community resource.

I know that the Minister takes such matters very seriously. In recent months, he has spent a long time looking into issues in deprived Unionist areas in particular, and deprived areas generally. He has spoken to many people in local communities in Belfast and in rural areas. I know that he has heard directly from many organisations, community groups and individuals who make extensive use of Orange halls and other halls, and who have told him how important it is that those facilities continue to be made available for local communities in their areas.

The new clause is in line with the Government's recent derating of Orange halls, and it is all of a piece with the proposals announced by the Minister recently, when he said that he was in the business of trying to bring about regeneration and give confidence to deprived Unionist and loyalist areas. If the Government were to adopt the amendment, it would be seen as a positive step in not only Unionist communities, but nationalist communities.

The amendment would not cost the Government a considerable amount of money. They may say that we must not open the floodgates to large amounts of Government expenditure, but the fact that they have been prepared to move on the issue of the rates indicates that they recognise the issue.

The Minister followed through on his consultation process in those communities with a £33 million package, and something similar could be done to help communities in not only Belfast, but throughout Northern Ireland. The DUP welcomed that package, but we recognise that a lot of it was centred on deprived areas, particularly in Greater Belfast. We accept that the bulk of the most deprived areas are in Belfast, but we have also made the point that the process should not stop there and that more needs to be done for rural areas and the west of the Province. This is a tremendous opportunity for the Government to take that process forward and implement in a practical yet modest way a measure that would give a tremendous fillip to communities throughout Northern Ireland.

I urge the Minister to accept the amendment. It is clear that the current regulations, which require proof that a hall has been attacked unlawfully, maliciously and wantonly by three or more persons unlawfully, riotously or tumultuously assembled, or as a result of an act committed maliciously by a person acting on behalf of or in connection with an unlawful association, are often unworkable, because in a huge number of cases it is impossible to prove that those conditions were met. Such attacks often take place in the dead of night in isolated areas. Everyone in Northern Ireland knows that the motivation behind attacks on community halls is sectarian, yet obtaining compensation for such an attack can, even when it is done successfully, be tortuous and involve extremely costly insurance premiums.

Such premises should be categorised in the same way as agricultural premises, which have been categorised in Northern Ireland for the precise reasons that I have enunciated. Agricultural premises were targeted in the dead of night and, although everybody knew why it was happening, the matter could not be proved. Historically, the Government have recognised that certain types of buildings and premises deserve special categorisation, because they are in isolated areas and are difficult to protect and defend, and Unionist and nationalist halls across the community deserve to be placed in that category. I trust that the Minister will respond positively to the amendment.

Lembit Öpik: I want to add two thoughts to the remarks of the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds). First, it seems that there is some justification for saying that in certain circumstances in which natural justice would point towards a compensation payout, such payouts have been prevented by the strictures outlined by the hon. Gentleman, North, because the conditions are difficult to prove. He cites the example of a rural and isolated premises that might be subject to an arson attack. The same thing can happen in urban areas. Will the Minister outline his understanding of the extent to which this is a problem?

My second concern is that it looks as though an accident of circumstance can mean that an attack in two different situations will lead to very different outcomes as regards compensation, through no fault of the person making the compensation claim. What is the Minister's view of that apparent double standard? I know that he would agree that it is an unintended consequence of the Bill, but it strikes me that the new clause could resolve the disparity. It would be terribly undesirable were compensation not to be paid out in some situations. I hope that he can either accept the new clause or provide clarity about what the Government regard as the best course of action to ensure that those in rural and isolated areas, or those who cannot prove the nature of an attack, are not treated as second-class citizens.

Mr. Hanson: I thank the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) for tabling his new clause.

I start by utterly condemning any attacks or vandalism on Orange or Hibernian halls, or any other buildings used for meetings. Whether they are attacked as a matter of general vandalism or subject to an attack of a sectarian nature, that is unacceptable in a civilised society. I would urge, as would the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), that any individuals who had information about such attacks should take it to the police, who may be able to undertake prosecution. Those who carry out such attacks should face the full force of the law—that is self-evident in a civilised society.

Let me say to the hon. Member for Belfast, North in particular that the current criminal damage legislation is an important means of supporting individuals and groups who have suffered material loss over the period of conflict in Northern Ireland. Now that we are moving, I hope, to a more normal society, such attacks, particularly the sectarian ones, should be reduced. That will in due course have obvious implications for current criminal damage arrangements generally.

The Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 is particular to Northern Ireland. As we all know, that is because of the particular problems faced by Northern Ireland at that time. Such legislation does not exist in other parts of the United Kingdom. I want to reflect on the future of such compensation schemes, particularly in the context of a changing Northern Ireland and the Government's national approach to compensation. Of course, I recognise the great hurt and pain that can be caused, be it by a small act of vandalism causing a broken window or something much more serious in the shape of an arson attack on an entire building. The Police Service of Northern Ireland takes such criminal acts very seriously and will use the full weight of the law to prosecute the perpetrators.

Before turning to the new clause, I will respond to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who asked me about the nature and number of such attacks. I recently answered a parliamentary question—if it was not me, it was my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for security—which indicated that police figures show that over the past 15 years, attacks on Orange halls in particular have varied significantly. In 1997, there were 41 attacks; in 2004, there were six attacks; and the provisional figure for 2005 was higher than that for 2004. That information gives no specifics on the nature of the attack—it could be a broken window or a full arson attack on a building.

4.15 pm

The new clause seeks to change article 4 of the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, which was drafted to meet specific conditions relating to agricultural property, particularly the absence of a Chief Constable's certificate where the damage was caused by those acting on behalf of an illegal organisation, or the evidence of the involvement of three or more persons.

Claims for non-agricultural properties are covered under article 5 of the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977 and, where its conditions are satisfied, claimants can obtain compensation for damage to such property. A Chief Constable's certificate, or proof of the involvement of three or more persons or of an illegal organisation, are generally required as proof of liability in respect of claims for compensation. Where there is evidence of damage caused by civil disorder, for example, Orange halls can make claims under the provisions of the order. When claims are not met under compensation arrangements, they should fall under commercial insurance arrangements in the normal way. We are dealing here with the question of whether we should give compensation to Orange halls on a par with that given to agricultural buildings when there is no Chief Constable's certificate and no evidence of the involvement of three or more persons.

The effect of the new clause would be to extend the category of properties falling under article 4, which was not intended for that purpose. The Government believe that, when a property is damaged and when there is no Chief Constable's certificate and no evidence of the involvement of three or more persons—when the circumstances do not meet the evidential requirement of the legislation covering criminal damage compensation—the normal route for seeking compensation, in Northern Ireland as in other parts of the United Kingdom, is through general property insurance.

I recognise that there can be difficulties in obtaining insurance, and I have discussed this issue with the hon. Member for Belfast, North. The Orange Order is a powerful organisation in the fabric of Northern Ireland, however, and it represents an awful lot of individuals and organisations. I would hope that it could use its power to raise these issues with the insurance companies.

I know that it will disappoint the hon. Gentleman that I am unable to accept his new clause today. The provisions relating to the specific circumstances of agricultural properties were made in 1977. There is an anomaly involved, as that is the only area that is covered. However, there is compensation available for circumstances involving collective discontent and disorder, and compensation can also be obtained with a Chief Constable's certificate or with evidence of the involvement of three or more people. I am unable to accept the new clause for those reasons.

Lady Hermon: If the Minister is not prepared to accept the new clause, will he consider an alternative that would make things easier for organisations such as the Ancient Order of Hibernians and, particularly, the Orange Order, which bears the brunt of these problems? Could not the Northern Ireland Office pay for CCTV cameras to be installed at the premises of such organisations, in order that they might gather the evidence themselves under the present scheme? Will the Minister agree to that?

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Lady will know that I have recently announced additional resources for CCTV cameras, and a competition for individual organisations to bid for such cameras. That is possible for any organisation to do, subject to their demonstrating that the cameras would be of benefit in the prevention of crime. In principle, there is nothing to preclude an organisation from bidding for CCTV cameras to cover Orange halls. I cannot, and nor would I wish to, fund CCTV cameras at every Orange hall site, because that would be an impractical way of implementing Government policy. However, in principle, there is nothing wrong with applications being made to that effect.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North mentioned the significant investment of £33 million in areas of deprivation, and we have also undertaken the derating of Orange halls, which has released significant resources to the organisation. I know that he and his party welcomed that move, having pressed for it. The Government supported that change, and considered it a positive move forward in releasing those resources to the Orange halls. I know that he will be disappointed that I cannot accept his new clause today, but I cannot. I have explained the reasons for my decision, and I hope that he will withdraw it on that basis.

Mr. Dodds: I have listened to the Minister's comments and I am disappointed that he does not feel able to accept the new clause or to take on board the suggestion made by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) that he might at least provide such halls with the opportunity to try to claim compensation—as many of them do not have insurance—by gathering evidence from CCTV.

Mr. Hanson: I emphasise again that if the Chief Constable offers certification to the effect that the damage was caused by disorder or other associated means, and if three or more people were involved, criminal compensation can be claimed. The problem only exists if fewer people were involved.

Mr. Dodds: I understand that that is the legal position, which is precisely the problem. That is why we have tabled the new clause. While we understand that three or more people must be involved in an attack for compensation to be payable, the difficulty is proving that three or more people were involved. We are talking about buildings that have clearly been destroyed for sectarian reasons and as part of a wider campaign, as has been happening for decades in Northern Ireland. It was for precisely that reason that the Government introduced an exception for agricultural premises in section 4 of the 1997 order, to which the Minister referred. That accepted that, for certain types of premises, it would be difficult to provide proof.

My party's suggestion is that the same criteria should apply in relation to halls—primarily Orange halls, but also to nationalist halls such as the Ancient Order of Hibernians and others—so that they are not crippled in that way and that local communities are not deprived of an extremely valuable resource, in many cases for years and sometimes for ever. All hon. Members recognise the valuable and important role that such parish halls play in our communities up and down the land, day in and day out.

Lembit Öpik: In that context, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Minister's position seems to step against normalisation, as he has created a double standard in relation to the burden of proof in some circumstances? I cannot see why the Minister is making such heavy weather of accepting a fairly common-sense proposal that provides proper and sensible protection in a way that cannot realistically be abused.

Mr. Dodds: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I hope that his additional words, even at this late stage, will cause the Minister to think again. This short debate has illustrated a fairly strong consensus on the issue. Most people see the proposal as fairly modest. It is in line with Government policy, the recent announcement of a package of measures and the recent announcement on derating. It accepts that there are anomalies for certain types of premises. The proposal simply ensures that local communities will not be deprived.

Finally, the Minister asked whether the owners of such halls, and the Orange Order in particular, could go to the insurers and talk to them. No doubt the Minister will be aware—some of his colleagues should be, as the Orange Order has made this clear to Ministers in talks—that this matter has been the subject of years of discussion and negotiation with insurers. The trouble is that those discussions are not getting anywhere. As a result, halls up and down the land either cannot get insurance any more or any insurance that is available to them is so exorbitant that it simply cannot be obtained.

For those reasons, and in view of the expressions of support in the House, I shall press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 4

ANONYMOUS REGISTRATION: NORTHERN IRELAND

'After section 9 of the 1983 Act insert—

"9A Anonymous registration: Northern Ireland

(1) This section applies if an application for registration in a register of parliamentary electors of local government electors is made in accordance with the requirements for the purposes of section 10A(1)(a) below and is accompanied by—

(a) an application under this section made in accordance with prescribed requirements (an application for an anonymous entry),

(b) a declaration made in accordance with such requirements for the purposes of this section, and

(c) such evidence in support of the application for anonymous registration as may be prescribed.

(2) If the registration officer determines that the person is entitled to be registered, he must also determine whether the safety test is satisfied.

(3) If the registration officer determines that the safety test is satisfied—

(a) section 9(2) does not apply in relation to the person; and

(b) the person's entry in the register shall instead contain letters in the prescribed form and his electoral number.

(4) An entry containing the matters mentioned in subsection (3)(b) above is referred to in this Act as an anonymous entry.

(5) If an anonymous entry is made in respect of a person, the registration officer shall remove any other entry in the register for that person.

(6) If the registration officer does not determine that the safety test is satisfied, no entry is to be made in respect of him in the register (whether an anonymous entry or otherwise).

(7) Subsection (6) above does not affect—

(a) any other entry in the register for the person;

(b) the determination of any further application for registration which is made by the person (including an application which is treated as having been made by him by virtue of section 10A(2) below).

(8) Any communication sent by a registration officer or the returning officer for any election to a person who has an anonymous entry (A) must be sent in an envelope or other form of covering so as not to disclose to any other person that A has an anonymous entry.

(9) The safety test is satisfied if the safety of the applicant for an anonymous entry or that of any other person of the same household would be at risk if the register contains the name of the applicant or his qualifying address.

(10) In this section, "determines" means determines in accordance with regulation.

9B Removal of anonymous entry: Northern Ireland

(1) If a person has an anonymous entry in a register, his entitlement to remain in pursuance of the application for registration mentioned in section 9A(1) terminates—

(a) at the end of the period of 12 months beginning with the date when the entry in the register first takes effect, or

(b) if the declaration made for the purposes of section 9A is at the time when the declaration is cancelled.

(2) Subsection (1) above does not affect the application of any other provision of this Act or of the Representation of the People Act 1985 which has the effect that the person's entitlement to registration terminates before the expiry of the 12 month period mentioned in subsection (1) or before the cancellation of the declaration made for the purposes of section 9A.

(3) If a person's entitlement to remain registered terminates by virtue of subsection (1) above, the registration officer concerned shall remove his entry from the register, unless he is entitled to remain registered with an anonymous entry in pursuance of a further application for registration accompanied by a further application under section 9A."'.—[Mr. Alan Reid.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Alan Reid: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 17, in clause 3, page 2, line 29, leave out subsection (b) and insert—

'(b) the year 2015;

(c) every tenth year following 2015;'.

No. 18, in page 3, line 2, leave out '2010' and insert '2015'.

No. 19, in page 3, line 3, leave out '2010' and insert '2015'.

No. 20, in page 3, line 4, leave out paragraph (c).

Mr. Reid: New clause 4 replicates the provisions of section 10 of the Electoral Administration Act 2006, which introduces anonymous registration provisions in Great Britain but does not extend to Northern Ireland. However, the principal justifications for anonymous registration in Great Britain apply equally well in Northern Ireland.

In Great Britain, people who fear that their security, or that of their families, will be put at risk if their names appear on the register are allowed to apply to register anonymously. Given that the principles behind anonymous registration were debated at length in Committee, where there was widespread support for introducing it in Northern Ireland, I shall not repeat all the arguments today.

We have tabled the new clause to elicit from the Minister an explanation of why the Government treat Northern Ireland differently from the rest of the UK. The Government do not intend to use the Bill to introduce anonymous registration in Northern Ireland, but instead will do so means of an Order in Council. As a result, people there will not be able to take advantage of anonymous registration until much later than their counterparts in Great Britain. I hope that the Minister will answer a few questions about that.

Will there be a consultation in Northern Ireland before the Government introduce the secondary legislation here? Secondary legislation cannot be debated and amended by this House, so consultation is even more important than with primary legislation.

Do the Government have a proposed timetable for implementation of the provision? When do they intend to bring the Order in Council before the House? Will it be in place before the annual canvass planned for next year? That is important because, if it is not in place then, people who might want to register anonymously will be forced to make a choice. If they decide not to register, they will give up their right to vote, but if they remain fully on the register, they could put themselves or their families at risk. The next canvass is not due until 2010, but it could be as late as 2016 if the Secretary of State uses his power of veto.

Lembit Öpik: The Minister is likely to stand up and give the reasons why the Government are not willing to accept this common sense proposal, and we have just had a vote on a matter in which he showed no interest at all. He did not take the DUP's amendment at all seriously, but does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister would do a lot better if he showed some sympathy and empathy for what is being proposed?

Mr. Reid: I agree wholeheartedly. The Minister showed little sympathy for the earlier amendment. I hope that he will do better this time and at least answer my questions properly. People's right to vote is a key element of a democratic society, but they are also entitled to exercise that right in complete security and in a way that does not put at risk their lives, or the lives of their families.

The right to anonymous registration has been introduced in the rest of the UK. I do not see why it should not be introduced in Northern Ireland, especially given the all-party support that the proposal received in Committee. I look forward to hearing the Minister answer my questions.

4.45 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I shall speak to amendments Nos. 17 to 20, aspects of which we discussed at earlier stages.

Accuracy of the register is extremely important. We expressed concerns about the abolition of the annual canvass in previous debates; today, we are discussing the same thing in a different way. We were concerned about the Secretary of State's ability to override the chief electoral officer and, indeed, the legislation. We are now looking at the matter slightly differently. Our amendments would ensure that a canvass took place in 2015 and every 10 years thereafter, so that even if one canvass was delayed, others would be carried out in those years.

We were a little concerned about the abolition of the annual canvass, but having discussed it with the former CEO, we understood some of the reasons. He felt that it would be better if he could deploy his resources on encouraging people to register rather than carrying out an annual canvass. I can appreciate both sides of the argument, but I am concerned that the Secretary of State could say that a canvass should never be carried out. It is important to hold a canvass every so often, as people move or slip through the net.

[Mr. Laurence Robertson]

I commend our amendments; they are innocuous and I am sure that the Government will see them in that way. I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr. Hanson: I appreciate the way in which the hon. Members for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) and for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) made their proposals.

The Government and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute have a common interest. It is our intention broadly to mirror the provisions on anonymous registration, for the reasons that we discussed in the Committee of the whole House some weeks ago. Anonymous registration is vital to protect individuals who feel threatened and we agree with it. The question is how to do it.

The new clause would replicate the provisions of the Electoral Administration Bill, and the reason I cannot accept the new clause is not that we are not on the same wavelength in respect of anonymous registration but because there are differences in the operation of electoral law in Northern Ireland. There are registration conditions and anti-fraud measures that do not apply to the rest of the United Kingdom, including, for example, proof of identity requirements at the polling station that are not necessary in Great Britain and which make anonymity more difficult to maintain. There is a range of reasons.

We shall introduce an Order in Council to give effect to the same principle that the hon. Gentleman wants to achieve, but in a Northern Ireland context. The proposals will be introduced later so that we can consider their implications for Northern Ireland, but the principle is exactly the same. I want anonymous registration in due course and we shall introduce the order after the consultation process. We hope that that will not be long after the scheme is introduced in Great Britain and that any difference in time scale will be a matter of only a few months. I hope that it will be only a few weeks, and that we can introduce the order quickly.

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman does not support the whole idea of Orders in Council. I realise that they are not amendable and that that gives rise to difficulties, but on this occasion there are real reasons, which I have outlined, for an Order in Council. I do not expect that he will disagree with the content of the order because it will achieve his objectives, but in a Northern Ireland context.

I turn to the points made by the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson). If he looks at clause 3, as I know that he has done, he will see that the Government's clear intention is that there will be a canvass in 2010. The key point of his amendments is that, if the chief electoral officer believes that the canvass in 2010 is not necessary for him to meet the registration objectives that we have also set out in the legislation—for example, if he feels that a canvass would not improve the comprehensiveness or accuracy—and he believes that, for his own purposes, that the cost of that canvass is not justified, he can recommend to the Secretary of State that the 2010 canvass be cancelled.

Only if such a recommendation is made can the Secretary of State make an order to remove the requirement for a canvass to held in 2010. The Secretary of State cannot unilaterally cancel the canvass in 2010; he can only do so if the chief electoral officer makes a recommendation to that effect because the chief electoral officer, not the Secretary of State, believes that the canvass should be cancelled. Even if that were the case and the Secretary of State accepted the chief electoral officer's recommendation, it would be subject to approval by both the House and another place.

Canvasses are very resource-intensive in terms of both labour and money. It is only right that the chief electoral officer has the power to determine how his resources will be best deployed in determining whether or not a canvass is necessary in 2010. Indeed, the hon. Member for Tewkesbury will know that 2010 is only four years after the final annual canvass, which will take place very shortly. I hope that, with the assurance that the Secretary of State has a power only to accept a recommendation, the hon. Gentleman will not press any of his amendments and that the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Reid: I was pleased to hear the Minister say that the Government are committed to the principle of introducing anonymous registration to Northern Ireland, that there would be a consultation process and that the legislation would come into effect either only a few weeks or, at most, a few months after the legislation for the rest of the United Kingdom. I was pleased about those assurances, in view of which I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 6

APPOINTMENT OF VISITOR FOR A CHILD WHO IS NOT BEING VISITED

'For Article 31(1) of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order SI No.755 (N.I. 2) substitute:

"(1) Where it appears to an authority in relation to any child whom the authority is accommodating under Article 21 for a continuous period of more than 3 months that it would be in the child's best interests for an independent person to be appointed to be his visitor for the purposes of this Article, the authority shall appoint such a visitor.

(1A) In ascertaining the child's best interest under 31(1) the authority must take into account the child's age and understanding about the appointment of an independent visitor subject to subsection (5).".'.—[Lady Hermon.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lady Hermon: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins) to his new responsibilities in the Northern Ireland Office and pay tribute to his predecessor, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith), who worked extremely hard and was very well liked in Northern Ireland. We wish her well, and we also wish his other colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward), well in his new post.

The new Minister is most welcome to Northern Ireland. I hope that he enjoys it, is extremely successful and delivers all that I request, including accepting the new clause.

Since this is the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, I have an opportunity to introduce, under the heading of miscellaneous, a very important issue that has come to my attention for a certain reason in North Down. The new clause would amend the current wording of article 31 of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. If no next of kin or other family member has visited a child in care within 12 months, the relevant authority should certainly appoint an independent visitor to see to the needs and request of the young person who is in care.

I understand that the system of independent visitors has worked extremely well in Wales, but the practice has been very patchy in Northern Ireland, where some trusts appoint independent visitors, while others choose not to do so or leave doing so until the eleventh hour. The new clause would ensure that, if there had not been a visit to a child in care in a much shorter period of time—three months—an independent visitor would, of necessity, be appointed.

The matter came to my attention in my constituency for a very particular reason. The whole of Northern Ireland is serviced by one juvenile justice centre, which was opened recently. I pay tribute to—sadly—the late Martin Mogg, who led the way in many ways. He was very progressive in his thinking about modernising juvenile justice in Northern Ireland and I had the great good fortune of being first shown around the juvenile justice centre on the Rathgael road in Bangor by him. I knew at the time that he was ill, but I did not realise just how ill. I am sure that other hon. Members who knew him will wish to join me in paying tribute to his efforts to modernise juvenile justice in Northern Ireland.

I first visited the juvenile justice centre on Good Friday 2004. We are talking about young people who, allegedly, have committed serious offences in Northern Ireland, but who are juveniles. During the course of conversations with some of those young people—particularly the young women, who were being taught for the first time to iron clothes and the young men who were being taught how to make scrambled egg, if I remember correctly, and were delighted to have been given skills to cook, wash, iron and look after themselves—many of them expressed reservations about returning to their communities.

Those young people—particularly the young women—also gave me a clear impression of how they felt let down by the care system in Northern Ireland. That has remained with me in my conscience for two years. As I say, we have a vehicle to change things and to try to improve the care system in Northern Ireland for young people. It seems a terribly sad fact of life that young people who have gone into care—particularly young women—have ended up in the juvenile justice centre. We have let them down badly somewhere along the line.

I have not drafted the new clause with particular care, but I want to put it on the record that we definitely need a care system that is much more flexible in terms of independent visitors or advocates for young people who go into care for whatever reason—and there are always a variety of reasons. I do not wish those young people to end up in the juvenile justice centre. If the Minister cannot accept the wording of the new clause, I hope that he will give a clear commitment that the issue will be looked at seriously and promptly by the Northern Ireland Office and those who are responsible for juvenile justice in Northern Ireland..

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell: I welcome the opportunity to raise my concern about child welfare. There are many serious issues. Although I welcome the purpose and intent of my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) in proposing the new clause, I have some concerns. I would have preferred the new clause to have been additional to the current legislation, rather than something to be used instead of it. As I understand it—I am subject to correction if I am wrong—article 31(1) of the children order allows independent visitors to be appointed only for children who are in care. Children in care are defined by articles 25(1) and 27(2) as children under care orders. That means that independent visitors cannot be appointed for other children who are very much in need, but who are not fully in care or fully under care orders. Such children may nevertheless need and seek considerable assistance with finding a place to live. They are generally teenage children who are in transition to independent living, but not always. They are known as article 21 children. There is a serious defect because these children are very much in need of support. They are in a halfway house, or no-man's land, between care and independent living. The new clause would certainly go a long way towards addressing the problem.

The new clause would delete article 31(1) and substitute the new wording, but that would create a new problem, because article 31(1) is essential for the protection of children in care. In fact, we need both provisions. We need visitors to be appointed to children in care, but I would claim that we also need visitors appointed to the many children who are not quite in care or under care orders, but at the boundaries. Such children need support as they move from being in care to independent living.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the system fails badly to follow up how those young people are doing after they get out into the community? They are very vulnerable.

Dr. McDonnell: I thank the hon. Lady because I am making exactly the point that there is a transition phase. The follow-up is poor and, in many cases, weak. We have many problems in Northern Ireland with inadequate child care. The inadequacy is often driven by underfunding, which is being compounded at the moment by cuts at the education board level. I do not like to bring this matter to the feet of our new Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), immediately, because I would like to give him the opportunity to get to grips with the situation, but there is a serious problem. I welcome the new clause, but I would have preferred the new provision to be additional to article 31(1)—perhaps that is not possible at this stage—because we need to hold on to the existing article. I am in a dilemma about that, so I would like to hear his comments. We need to retain the old provision as well as adding the wording in the new clause.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I support the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), who moved new clause 6, and the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), both of whom have a much more detailed knowledge of such matters than I. However, I know from representations that I have received and conversations that I have had in Belfast and elsewhere that there is considerable concern about the inadequacy of child care and supervision in the Province. The hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) outlined that in her intervention, too.

I, too, welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), to his new post. I am sure that his background will give him a real insight into the problems and sympathy with the situation. In his previous incarnation, he had a degree of responsibility for some of the most difficult young people in the United Kingdom, and I met him when he was acting in that capacity on at least one occasion. These young people need not soft treatment, but care and concern. No matter what offences they may have committed, they must have the chance of rehabilitation and hope, and I think that that is what the hon. Member for North Down is trying to achieve.

The hon. Lady indicated that the drafting of the new clause might not be absolutely acceptable at the moment, but she has put down a marker. I hope that the Minister will reply by indicating his concern and willingness to examine the situation. The care of young people in Northern Ireland is a matter that the Select Committee might want to address in a future inquiry because there is concern about it throughout the Province. With those few words of general support for the principle of the amendment, I hope that we will hear a positive response from the Dispatch Box.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I support the idea of having a visitor for young people. I have been involved in youth work for more than 20 years, and I recognise some of what the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) referred to. I remember visiting an organisation in the city of Belfast which dealt with young people from 11 up to 16. I visited one small apartment of a young lady of 15 years of age. She had a young baby in the corner in one of the prams. I was informed that that was her second child. Some of the young people had been used on the streets of Belfast by paramilitary organisations and some of them had got pregnant.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) mentioned follow-up visits, which are important. Through that organisation, the young people were learning how to take care of basic domestic tasks, from ironing clothes through to handling money, including learning about computers so that they could keep basic accounts. Those were tremendous achievements, but the young people needed to be visited. Many of them had gone through traumatic times, not only because they were used on the streets, but because they were abused in homes by family members. We need to push for such support. Will the Minister give the new clause serious consideration and see whether there is something that he can do?

DEFERRED DIVISION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am now to announce the result of a Division deferred on the question of a Joint Committee on Conventions.

On the motion on the Joint Committee on Conventions, the Ayes were 416, the Noes were 19, so the motion was agreed to.

[The Division List is published at the end of today's debates.]

Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Sammy Wilson: I have no hesitation in supporting the new clause. The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) has identified an important problem. Youngsters who are taken into care in Northern Ireland face many disadvantages, which hon. Members mentioned, both when they leave care and when they are in it. Not least, they face disadvantages in getting an education.

Many youngsters have come from backgrounds in which their families have been disrupted and their lives have been in turmoil in their early years. They come into care with considerable educational disadvantages because they have not attended school regularly—perhaps because they have not been encouraged to attend, because they are persistent truants, or because they come from dysfunctional families. A recent ministerial response to me said that about 90 per cent. of such youngsters leave school without the basic qualifications that one would expect from schools in Northern Ireland.

I understand that the role of the visitor is to befriend youngsters and to act as an advocate on their behalf. I am not clear whether that would extend to the visitor acting as someone who can take up the problems that the youngster may have with school and act as an intermediary, or whether their role would be to identify some of the problems that the youngster faces with education, and then persuade someone else to intervene. The one thing I know is that we can no longer tolerate a situation in which so many youngsters, who already have an accumulation of disadvantages, are put out into the wide world at 17 with little or no support and without the basic educational skills that will enable them to get some stability back into their lives. If the new clause helps at least to move us in that direction, in all social conscience, we must accept it and progress in that direction.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Paul Goggins): I thank the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) for her warm welcome and hon. Members on both sides of the House for the welcome they have offered to me in this debate and elsewhere in the past few days. In a gentle way this afternoon, the hon. Lady finally got her revenge. As a Home Office Minister for the past three years, I have taken a range of criminal justice legislation through the House. On the Floor of the House and in Committee, I have engaged in discussions with her on a range of issues. She often said, "If this is good enough for England and Wales, why is it not good enough for Northern Ireland?", to which I always replied sympathetically that that was a matter for Northern Ireland Ministers. Well, here we are.

The hon. Lady raises an important issue. The intention behind the new clause, which is clearly thoughtful and caring, is shared by hon. Members across the House. The Chair of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), alluded to my past. In the first 15 years of my working life, I worked with children as well as troubled children in care. I hope that some of what I learned then will inform my new responsibilities in Northern Ireland.

There is a debate about whether the responsibility placed on the trust to appoint an independent visitor should begin after three months or 12 months. Some may regard three months as too early, some may regard 12 months as too late. There is genuine discussion and reflection to be had. There is, however—I think that the hon. Lady recognised this—a technical difficulty with the new clause to which my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) alluded. The provisions on independent visitors apply to all children, whether they are in voluntary accommodation or the subject of a care order. The inclusion of a reference to article 21 of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 would mean that the facility to appoint independent visitors applied only in relation to children in voluntary care. It would take away any requirement to appoint independent visitors for children who were the subject of care orders. That presents us with a difficulty.

I feel strongly—I sense from the discussion that right hon. and hon. Members agree—that there is a need to ensure that children in care in Northern Ireland have a stronger voice within the various discussions that we have. I was pleased on Sunday to host a fun day in the grounds of Hillsborough castle for the fostering network and to meet representatives of Voices of Young People in Care, who said some interesting things to me. They carried out some research as recently as last year that highlighted a number of the issues facing young people in care in Northern Ireland. They want more contact, where it is possible, with their family and friends. They want to have greater input in the decisions that affect them, as well as to highlight some of their difficulties in learning to trust and to engage with new people.

I was pleased, therefore, in coming to this new role, to find that the children and young people funding package that was launched by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in March contains an additional £660,000 to provide an independent advocacy and peer mentoring service for children in care across Northern Ireland. That package and the resource it brings will help us, along with other measures, to promote greater stability and continuity of care placements, which are so important.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: May I flag up an issue that is close to my heart? A lot of young vulnerable people in care homes are self-harmers. When they are released back into the community, they sometimes, sadly, become suicide statistics. We must look at the whole question around mental health provision. We must allow more money to be spent on those young adolescents who suffer mental illness following whatever traumas they have suffered throughout their young lives.

5.15 pm

Paul Goggins: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for raising the issue. In my first few days in post, I have seen submissions, reports and correspondence on suicide and self-harm. I hope to build on the work of my predecessor and address the problem for children in care and more widely, because suicide and self-harm rates in Northern Ireland are worryingly high. I look forward to discussing that concern with her in future.

The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) made an important point about the need for better educational outcomes for looked-after children. I hope that the packages that we are developing will help young people in care to have a greater say in the decisions that affect their lives and future. I intend shortly to consult on proposals to place the independent advocacy service on a statutory footing, which is a significant step forward, and I look forward to hon. Members' contributions and observations. It is important that the new service complements, and does not obstruct, other provisions for independent visitors and the personal advisers appointed when children leave care. I agree that it is important to follow through—we should not abandon children when they leave care.

Sir Patrick Cormack: In view of the widespread concern among Members on both sides of the House, will the hon. Gentleman give evidence on his new package of measures to the Select Committee so that we can look at them?

Paul Goggins: Who could resist such an invitation? I should be delighted to explain the package at an appropriate time. I repeat that it must be developed in consultation and discussion with professionals, children who have been in the care system, and hon. Members. In urging the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) to withdraw the motion, I pledge to make sure that she and other hon. Members are included in the consultation so that the solution commands broad consensus and will be of genuine benefit to looked-after children in Northern Ireland.

Dr. McCrea: Will the Minister confirm that his Department is already dealing with those issues and that its proposals will be introduced shortly? There is grave concern in the community that the problem should not be left to the long term, as we need active solutions on the ground.

Paul Goggins: I hesitate so early in my new post to give a specific time scale. Work is under way, and there is a £6 million package to promote fostering in Northern Ireland, which could transform the fostering network, recruit more foster carers, and give them better training and support. A series of measures will be introduced, and our debate has confirmed my view that the matter is urgent. We have a debt and obligation to looked-after children, and we must all fulfil it. In response to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire and other hon. Members, I will introduce proposals on a wider package as soon as possible.

Lady Hermon: I am grateful to the Minister for a typically thoughtful and full reply. I am glad that the traits that he demonstrated in his previous incarnation at the Home Office have been carried over to the Northern Ireland Office.

I welcome the announcement of increased advocacy arrangements for young people in care. In light of the views expressed by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) and the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), who speaks on health matters for the Democratic Unionist party, it would be helpful if they volunteered to join Colin Reid—the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children policy adviser who has helped to advance a wide range of children's issues on behalf of the charity—and myself in an early cross-party meeting with the Minister and his officials before his grilling by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee.

Paul Goggins: I confirm to the hon. Lady that I would be more than happy to do that, on a cross-party basis and with the advice of the voluntary sector, as she suggests.

Lady Hermon: I am grateful for that assurance and commitment given so early on by the Minister. With the consent, I am sure, of the hon. Member for Strangford and certainly that of the hon. Member for Belfast, South, may I say that we look forward to meeting the Minister very soon. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 7

AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 30 OF THE 1998 ACT

'(1) Section 30 of the 1988 Act (exclusion of Ministers from office) is amended as follows.

(2) After paragraph (1)(b) insert—

"(c) because he is no longer committed to upholding the rule of law in Northern Ireland".

(3) After paragraph (2)(b) insert—

"(c) because it is no longer committed to upholding the rule of law in Northern Ireland".

(4) After paragraph (7)(d) insert—

"(e) is committed now and in the future to upholding the rule of law in Northern Ireland".'.—[Mr. Laurence Robertson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 8—Amendment to section 30 of the 1988 Act—

'In Section 18 of the 1998 Act after subsection (8) insert—

"(8A) A Northern Ireland Minister shall not take up office until he has made a declaration before the Assembly pledging to uphold the rule of law."'.

Mr. Robertson: I add my welcome to the Minister. I hope he finds his time in the Northern Ireland Office fulfilling. I know that he will find it challenging and interesting. I look forward to working with him.

New clauses 7 and 8 revisit topics that we discussed in a slightly different context during earlier stages of the Bill. They refer to the requirement that Ministers in office uphold the rule of law, and that before they are appointed to office, they make a declaration before the Assembly pledging to uphold the rule of law. The new clauses add to sections 30 and 18 of the 1998 Act and the pledge of office.

On earlier amendments we debated support for the rule of law and for the police, so I do not intend to speak for too long, but as I did not take part in that debate, I hope I shall be allowed a few minutes to express my opinions. As has been said by various Members, we cannot allow a situation in Northern Ireland where Ministers are in control of the police, yet do not support the police. We cannot accept that situation or move towards it.

Last week I visited south Armagh. The people there, the Army and the police were clear that the situation had improved immeasurably, and I accept that it has. However, it may be useful to the House, especially to Members who may not visit Northern Ireland regularly, if I describe the situation there. The Army still accompanies the police when they go around south Armagh, particularly in Crossmaglen. The police are often refused service in shops. They are concerned about what will happen as the Army pulls out of the area. Criminality is continuing and, in the words of the people in the area, there is a long, long way to go before normality is reached.

Given that background, it is reasonable that we should ask any Minister who has the potential to be in control of the police, and of the other offices of Northern Ireland as well, to make a declaration before the Assembly pledging to uphold the rule of law. I do not see that there can be any objection to that requirement, other than one: there may be a party—Sinn Fein—that would object to that requirement. If we allow that party to get in the way of writing the requirement into the Bill, what does that say about the entire process?

We feel strongly about new clauses 7 and 8. Yes, there is a requirement in the Bill to pursue non-violent and democratic means, but the Bill, like the 1998 Act, should require the additional declaration before the Assembly pledging to uphold the rule of law. If that were the requirement, the constitutional and legitimate parties in Northern Ireland would find it much easier to move towards the full restoration of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mark Durkan Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would be extremely helpful to the Chair if the hon. Gentleman were to make a positive indication of wishing to contribute, because he might have lost his place.

Mark Durkan: New clauses 7 and 8 are better than the provisions that we examined in Committee, but we are still concerned on a couple of counts. On the new grounds for exclusion, the question whether people are committed to upholding the rule of law in Northern Ireland leaves a lot of room for interpretation. Earlier today, I mentioned the attitude of parties to the Parades Commission's rulings, to the performance of the police in enforcing such rulings and to the ensuing violence in the case of Whiterock. It is possible to question many parties other than Sinn Fein about their attitude to upholding the rule of law.

We now face the additional problem created by the step too far by the leader of the Ulster Unionist party in incorporating the leader of the political wing of the Ulster Volunteer Force into the UUP Assembly group. I assume that the Independent Monitoring Commission's examination of the activities of political parties in the Assembly would centre on the rights and roles in the Assembly of the new UUP Assembly group rather than distinctively or specifically the Progressive Unionist party, because the IMC has powers, which have not yet been activated, on the conduct and rights of parties in the Assembly. That is an additional complication, and, because we are all coming to terms with it and hoping that other people might resolve it for us, it would be dangerous to accept new clause 7.

New clause 8 proposes an addition to the pledge of office. As I have said, the SDLP is happy to consider in the context of a proper review of the agreement altering the pledge of office to include commitments on the rule of law or, indeed, the Police Service of Northern Ireland. In that context, new commitments could be made to people who participate in all the institutions or who exercise responsibility in all of the institutions. I originally drafted the pledge of office when we negotiated the agreement, and I was careful not to build in a commitment to all the institutions, because that would be unfair to Ministers who oppose the agreement—people should not have to sign up to the agreement to take office. Equally, we did not build in specific commitments at that stage in relation to policing and the rule of law. If the circumstances have changed, we could consider that matter, but it should be done in the context of a review agreed by the parties rather than by the House acting at its own behest.

Lembit Öpik: I find it hard to disagree with new clauses 7 and 8, but they are slightly meaningless. That is not because the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) lacks meaning—he has made a profound and ongoing contribution to the peace process—but because, to put it bluntly, Britain's prisons are full of people who are innocent and who are willing to pledge to tell the truth and to uphold the rule of law. When I consider the recent history of Northern Ireland, I am not sure what we would achieve by including that additional pledge. If we listen to the testimony from various individuals in Northern Ireland, nobody robbed the Northern bank. Even if by some miracle the hon. Member for Tewkesbury succeeds, against all previous evidence, in convincing the Minister to listen, to be persuaded, to do some joined-up government and to accept the new clause, I still suspect that individuals may occasionally be economical with the truth.

5.30 pm

Mr. Hanson: Before the hon. Gentleman gets into the habit of saying that the Minister does not listen, will he consider the fact that I have tabled at least two amendments that reflect discussions that took place during previous debates in this House?

Lembit Öpik: I credit the Minister for showing signs of listening. He is doing quite well. As a general progress report, it is good to see that he is beginning to make up for nine years of parliamentary deafness by some of his colleagues, although there is some way to go yet. In parenthesis, I would say to him that the Liberal Democrats were provoked into supporting the new clause tabled by the DUP because he showed no willingness to show any empathy with a point that seemed utterly reasonable and which hon. Members made with sincerity. I do not want to have a go at the Minister—I think that he is a very nice man. I will be in his constituency in a few days' time, and I do not want him to be annoyed with me. [Interruption.] I shall let him know, but it is not perhaps terribly relevant to what we are discussing now.

If the hon. Member for Tewkesbury insists on pressing the new clause, I will have to vote for it in the same way that one would vote for motherhood and apple pie. I have issued a reality check about the likelihood of its making a difference. Hope springs eternal, but I think that it will take more than another pledge to bring things together in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Cormack: It is good to have a Liberal Democrat who would be prepared to vote for motherhood and apple pie.

I rise briefly to support most strongly the new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson). I will not repeat what I said earlier this afternoon, the House will be relieved to hear, but I do believe very strongly that it is crucial that those who take a place in the Executive—let us hope that one can be formed—are utterly and publicly committed to upholding the rule of law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury referred to his visit to south Armagh. I was privileged to take the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee there last week, and everything that he says is absolutely true. Yes, there has been significant advance—nobody denies that—but one still has to travel in an armoured helicopter or an armoured vehicle, and in a convoy. We heard some pretty horrific tales of people being set upon and beaten up. We also heard tales of extraordinary courage—of young police officers who, despite suffering the most dreadful injuries, still returned to their posts wanting to serve in south Armagh because they do so love the countryside and the people. We are dealing with a very small number of evil people and a very large number of decent ones. It is crucial that there should be public and proclaimed commitment to the rule of law. That is all that my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury is seeking to achieve.

I make one other point because my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who has himself taken a considerable interest in these matters over the years, has just come into the Chamber. When he and I entered this House in June 1970, almost 36 years ago, the Province was represented for the most part by Ulster Unionist party Members, who sat with us on what was in those days the Government side of the House and received the Whip. I might say that the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) entered on the same day and sat in the same place.

I was deeply concerned earlier this week when I learned of the extraordinary arrangement between the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Ulster Unionist party. I can well understand the misgivings that the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) was courageous enough to proclaim in the House this afternoon. Let us hope that I am proved wrong, and that there is more to it than the official reason that was given immediately afterwards. Let us hope that what the hon. Lady heard last night turns out to be true. However, at the moment, it looks like a rather cynical manoeuvre, and it is one that I am deeply distressed about, having always had a profound respect for that party. It has had its ups and downs, but it has always been consistently and absolutely democratic and law abiding. To find it now put into the same category as Sinn Fein by the Secretary of State's statement today is very distressing. I think that that was very unfair on his part, but it is nevertheless distressing.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) has his misgivings. He said that he was unhappy about the new clauses, but he went on to say that he was happy about a pledge to uphold the rule of law. He referred to the events of earlier this week, and it is those events that underline the need for everyone who is to play a constructive part in the Northern Ireland Assembly, particularly those in the Executive who will govern the Province, to make a public proclamation of their dedication to upholding the rule of law. I hope that it will not be necessary to vote on the new clause, because I hope that we shall have a good response from the Minister, but if it is necessary to go into the Lobby, I shall certainly support my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury most strongly.

Sammy Wilson: The new clause is key to the likelihood of devolution being successfully implemented in Northern Ireland and to whatever devolved Government we set up being sustainable in the long run. It surprises me that there has already been resistance to it from the Government. Without a commitment by all those involved in the devolved Assembly in Northern Ireland, and in the Executive within it, to supporting the police and upholding the rule of law, we can be sure that it will not be long before a crisis hits the Assembly and it collapses again. We have already experienced that. The previous Assembly stumbled from one crisis to another, and it was quite clear why that was happening. Periodically, one of the parties involved in the Executive showed that it did not support the police not only through its words but through its activities. It is unthinkable that we could have a workable Executive in which there was no commitment to upholding the rule of law and supporting the police.

My party and I share some of the reservations that have been expressed about the wording of the new clause. Of course it is possible for someone to take a pledge to uphold the rule of law and then totally disregard it, or say that their interpretation of it was different. The Northern Ireland Act 1998 required Ministers to be committed to "exclusively peaceful" means. The Sinn Fein Members signed up to that, while at the same time running a spy ring from their office. Members of their party were also engaged in gun running and, on a regular basis, extortion, criminality and murder were being carried out by the very people with whom they were associated.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: I want to highlight the fact that there is no such thing as a good terrorist, whether they are members of the UVF or the IRA, or Muslim extremists. If they are terrorists, they are terrorists, and murder is murder. I also want to point out how far down the road Sinn Fein-IRA have gone within the ethnic minority communities. Last year, the Government gave £10,000 to a community group called WARN, which stands for the West Against Racism Network. I think that it is well named. It operates out of west Belfast, and had prepared a package for ethnic minorities coming into west Belfast. A leaflet that was part of the package said that the PSNI was an extension of the British state and had no support in west Belfast, so it would not be in the interest of any ethnic minority grouping to call the police for any reason at all.

Sammy Wilson: I thank my hon. Friend for her point, and I will deal with that issue later. She has highlighted an important part of what we mean by supporting the rule of law.

Despite reservations that we might have about the effectiveness of any additional pledge, we support the new clause for two reasons. First, it is at least a step in the right direction. It counters the wrong signals sent out by the Government at present. Members have already referred to the Secretary of State giving evidence to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee last Thursday, which was an interesting session. During it, I put a simple question to him. I asked him whether it was "possible for an executive to be set up in Northern Ireland, with ministers from Sinn Fein, even though Sinn Fein had not at that stage given their support for policing."

His answer was extremely disturbing. First, he said that he did not want to "erect new hurdles to power sharing."

He went on to state:

"I do not want to make this"— a commitment to supporting the police—

"a pre-condition, and it will not be made a pre-condition, for the restoration of the institutions".

What could be a clearer signal to those who not only do not support the police but, as the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) has pointed out, actively discourage people from having anything to do with the police, even to the point that they seek to poison the minds of people who come to Northern Ireland from outside to get them into their way of thinking? Leaflets have been given to those who have come to west Belfast warning them not to go to the police station, not to report crimes to the police and not to go to the police station unaccompanied. What kind of message is that to send out?

The Secretary of State told the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee last week that he did not wish to erect a barrier to the setting up of the institutions. In this case, he did not want us to insist that Sinn Fein should desist from that kind of poisoning of people's minds. He went on to say that "there is no question that it is unsustainable in the medium-term, let alone the long- term, for parties to seek to have ministers in an executive when they are not co-operating with the police even at the most basic level or at a local level".

What is the medium term? How long can a Minister stay in office while the kind of poison that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Strangford have described—about not co-operating with the police—is pumped out by activists on the street?

At the weekend I did a television interview with a Sinn Fein representative. During the interview, I asked her whether she and her organisation would advise someone who had witnessed or had evidence of a rape to go to the police. One would have thought that a woman who was asked about that kind of issue would respond, "Of course, such a violation should be immediately reported to the police, and anyone with information should go to the police." However, all I got was rhetoric about the police recruiting informers and gathering intelligence in republican areas. Even as a woman, that Sinn Fein representative could not say unequivocally "We want people to report rapes to the police, and to give evidence." Someone who wants to be a Minister in a Government and who still associates with a party which, collectively and in terms of its individual members, gives such advice to the public is not fit to be in Government, and a Government containing such people will not, in my view, be sustainable.

5.45 pm

Mr. Dodds: Does not the point become rather more telling when we consider that one of the responsibilities of the social development Minister—a post that this Minister currently holds here—relates to antisocial behaviour orders, under housing legislation? It would be possible for a devolved social development Minister to deal with antisocial behaviour legislation in a housing context while not being prepared to tell people to support the PSNI, the agency that might be involved in enforcing the legislation. Surely that is nonsense.

Sammy Wilson: It would also be possible for an Education Minister not to encourage the public to give evidence when schools had been attacked and windows broken. I think that the new clause is a step in the right direction.

I was perturbed by the Secretary of State's apparent acceptance that Sinn Fein had done all that it could. When I pressed him again, he said:

"I do not want a late pre-condition established on top of the absolutely correct demands that have been made of republicans that they decommission, that they end their paramilitary activity and they end their criminality."

It would seem that the Secretary of State is sending a signal to Sinn Fein, saying "You have done all these things, we are thankful, and we do not want to press you any further."

Let me make it clear that this is not a new precondition. It is not an attempt to create a hurdle. It is a long-standing requirement. It is what was meant by the reference in the pledge of office to being committed to entirely democratic and peaceful means. That must involve upholding and supporting the police, which has not been done. It is therefore important for us to send the right signal.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan). I believe that this argument has been weakened somewhat by the activities of one of the Unionist parties in Northern Ireland. At least in the House of Commons, even today, all who represent the Unionist tradition have made it clear that they envisage no role in Government for those who have been involved in terrorism.

[Sammy Wilson]

Only last week, when the Secretary of State appeared before the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) put on record what the IMC report had said in paragraphs 2.30 and 2.31 about the activities of the Ulster Volunteer Force. I will not read it out now, because time is short. Two days later, the hon. Lady was completely undermined by her own party, which seemed to have ignored all that the IMC had said because, in terms of ministerial posts, it was in its interests to do so. That was the reason given. At the weekend I conducted an interview with one of the party's leading negotiators, and that was the only reason he gave. He did not say that it would help the UUP to persuade the UVF to give up its guns and its criminality; he simply said that it would give the party an extra position should an Executive be established.

I believe that that cynical exercise has, to an extent, undermined the position that the Unionists have adopted. I should make it clear, however, that we believe the same requirement should apply across the board. We cannot allow it to be weakened by the fact that some may have decided for cynical reasons to ally themselves with those whom the IMC has accused of being engaged in all kinds of criminal and terrorist activity.

This is an important new clause. The Government must stop being ambivalent toward the behaviour of Sinn Fein and its associates, and toward that of others involved in terrorist activity. It does not matter whether or not the Minister includes this test in the Bill: we will apply it to Sinn Fein. It would be much better to include that test in the Bill, however, so that the clear message is sent to terrorists and to Sinn Fein that the whole democratic body of the United Kingdom supports the test and requires that it is met. But we will make the judgment, and as we have made clear today, if Sinn Fein persists in its refusal to back law and order and the police, and persists in its refusal to encourage those who are influenced by it to support the police, it will not be regarded as fit for government and will not be included in the Executive.

The Minister is keen to have devolution in Northern Ireland by the end of November. The one way to ensure that that does not happen is to allow Sinn Fein to believe that it is not going to be pushed into doing the proper thing, the democratic thing, the right thing, which is to support the police, who will have to enforce the laws that they would wish to pass in an Executive.

Mr. Hanson: For the avoidance of any doubt, I say straight away to the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) that I will not be ambivalent in my comments on support for policing. This Government, the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins) and I all believe that Sinn Fein should be involved in, sign up to and support policing, and that it should take its places on the Policing Board. I am not going to defend in this House a situation in which attacks on schools could occur, or in which individuals are not encouraged to go to the police to ensure that information about rapes is passed on. I make it clear to the hon. Member for East Antrim and others that the Government look forward to the day when Sinn Fein members take their place on the Policing Board and all citizens of Northern Ireland respect and support policing in the community and at large.

We share the aim of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson)—

Dr. McCrea: Let us be clear: simply joining the Policing Board is not the test; the test is actively supporting the actions of the security forces as they establish democracy, the rule of law and the end of criminality in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Gentleman knows that I share those objectives.

Dr. McCrea indicated assent.

Mr. Hanson: I believe that everybody has the right to support the rule of law in that way. My problem with the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Tewkesbury relates to the ability to legislate according to it. First, it is important to put on the record that there is movement in the direction of travel that those who have spoken today want to see. In paragraph 2.19 of its 10th report, the Independent Monitoring Commission—an independent body, not the Government or a political party represented in this House—states:

"We believe that the leadership" of Sinn Fein and of the IRA

"has accepted the need to engage in policing if it is to achieve its aim of devolution of policing and justice to an Assembly and Executive in Northern Ireland. It has not...yet determined how this might be delivered", but it has said that it wishes to see that direction of travel.

Paragraph 2.13 of the report states:

"It remains our absolutely clear view that the PIRA leadership has committed itself to following a peaceful path."

I recognise that there is more work to be done, and in my role as Minister I will do all that I can to ensure that that it is done. The hon. Member for East Antrim said that there is a problem of definition with the new clause, and that is the nub of the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) intimated as much, because we cannot define what the rule of law means or what support for it means. We know the direction of travel in broad terms, but I cannot define it in legislation.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: The Minister will be aware that the word most often used in law is "reasonable". It is not possible to define exactly what that means.

Mr. Hanson: I put my points to the House and that is one of the points that it is important to recognise. I draw the attention of hon. Members back to a point that I discussed earlier, which concerns the pledge of office. The pledge of office in place at present ensures that all Ministers must affirm, before taking any post, a commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means. The current pledge of office can also be affected by IMC recommendations—and that is an important point. For example, if a future IMC report determined that individuals or organisations were not acting in the spirit of the pledge of office, safeguards are in place so that action could be taken.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I have a high regard for the Minister, as he knows, but there are times when the Government have to behave with real firmness. We need the smack of firm Government. The Government must tell these people that unless they make such a pledge, there is no place for them in the Government of any part of the UK. If the Government do not do that, they will not achieve devolved Government in Northern Ireland—which we want them to achieve.

Mr. Hanson: I reciprocate the hon. Gentleman's sentiments, but he will understand that every hon. Member who has spoken today shares the same objective. I simply do not feel that legislating for it in the way proposed, with due respect to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury, would achieve that end or, for the reasons of definition mentioned by the hon. Member for East Antrim, be applicable.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The situation arose after those men had taken that pledge: they resorted to violence and some of them made statements justifying it. Why was nothing done then? The Government did not say that those men had to leave the Executive: they closed down the whole lot. I was accused of a sin and so were all the other Members, but those men were not.

Mr. Hanson: If the right hon. Gentleman is not happy with the current pledge of office and its operation—I take it from his comments that he is not—I have given a commitment previously, and I reaffirm it today, that we are happy to consider further legislation in due course on a stronger pledge of office, if such measures are produced by agreement as part of discussions of strand 1 issues. He will know that I am happy to discuss that and, in fact, I have sat across a table from his colleagues and raised the prospect with them.

For the avoidance of doubt, I confirm that the Government are committed to supporting the rule of law and the involvement of Sinn Fein and other interested parties in policing. That is essential, but the new clause would not assist in that process and I ask the hon. Member for Tewkesbury to withdraw it.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: Given the fact that we have to finish this debate in less than a minute, I do not have time to go through the various arguments that have been made. The new clause is not watertight, but no legislation is. However, as the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) said, it would be a significant move in the right direction if we were to adopt it. I therefore have no option but to press the new clause to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Schedule 2

DEPARTMENT WITH POLICING AND JUSTICE FUNCTIONS

Amendments made: No. 7, in page 22, line 20, at end insert—

'PART A1

DEPARTMENT IN CHARGE OF MINISTER APPROVED BY RESOLUTION OF ASSEMBLY

Introduction

A1 (1) This Part of this Schedule has effect in relation to a Northern Ireland department—

(a) the functions of which consist wholly or mainly of devolved policing and justice functions; and

(b) in relation to which an Act of the Assembly provides, by virtue of section 21A(2A), for it to be in the charge of a Northern Ireland Minister (the "relevant Minister") appointed by virtue of a nomination—

(i) made by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly; and

(ii) approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with the support of a majority of the members voting on the motion for the resolution, a majority of the designated Nationalists voting and a majority of the designated Unionists voting.

(2) In this paragraph "devolved policing and justice function" has the same meaning as in section 21A (see subsection (6) of that section).

Section 18 not to apply to relevant Minister

A2 (1) Section 18 (Northern Ireland Ministers) shall not apply in relation to—

(a) the relevant Minister; or

(b) the Ministerial office held by the relevant Minister (the "relevant Ministerial office"), and paragraph A3 shall apply instead.

(2) But the references to Ministerial offices in—

(a) subsection (1)(c) and (d) of section 18; and

(b) subsection (5) of that section (in the definition of M), shall be taken to include the relevant Ministerial office.

Provisions relating to relevant Minister

A3 (1) Where any of the conditions in paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 18(1) is satisfied—

(a) the relevant Minister shall (if holding office at the time) cease to hold office; and

(b) the relevant Ministerial office shall be filled by applying sub-paragraphs (3) to (6) within a period specified in standing orders.

(2) The relevant Ministerial office shall be filled by applying sub-paragraphs (3) to (6) before section 18(2) to (6) is applied in relation to the other Ministerial offices.

(3) The First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly shall nominate a member of the Assembly to hold the relevant Ministerial office.

(4) The nomination shall not take effect unless it is approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with the support of—

(a) a majority of the members voting on the motion for the resolution;

(b) a majority of the designated Nationalists voting; and

(c) a majority of the designated Unionists voting.

(5) If—

(a) the nomination does not take effect within a period specified in standing orders; or

(b) the nominated person does not take up the office for which he has been nominated within that period, a further nomination of a member of the Assembly shall be made under sub-paragraph (3).

(6) Sub-paragraphs (3) to (5) shall be applied as many times as may be necessary to secure that the relevant Ministerial office is filled.

(7) The holding of office as First Minister or deputy First Minister shall not prevent a person being nominated to hold the relevant Ministerial office.

(8) The relevant Minister shall not take up office until he has affirmed the terms of the pledge of office.

(9) The relevant Minister shall cease to hold office if—

(a) he resigns by notice in writing to the First Minister and the deputy First Minister;

(b) he ceases to be a member of the Assembly otherwise than by virtue of a dissolution; or

(c) he is dismissed by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister acting jointly and the Presiding Officer is notified of his dismissal.

(10) If the relevant Minister ceases to hold office at any time, otherwise than by virtue of sub-paragraph (1), the relevant Ministerial office shall be filled by applying sub-paragraphs (3) to (6) within a period specified in standing orders.

(11) Where—

(a) the Assembly has resolved under section 30(2) that a political party does not enjoy its confidence; and

(b) the party's period of exclusion under that provision has not come to an end, no member of that party may be nominated under sub-paragraph (3).

(12) Where—

(a) the Secretary of State has given a direction under section 30A(5) in respect of a political party; and

(b) the party's period of exclusion under that provision has not come to an end,

no member of that party may be nominated under sub-paragraph (3).

(13) In this paragraph, a reference to a period of exclusion under any provision is, in the case of a period of exclusion under that provision which has been extended, a reference to that period as extended.'.

No. 8, in page 22, line 33, leave out 'subsections (6) and (7)' and insert 'subsection (6)'.

No. 9, in page 25, line 17, leave out 'subsections (6) and (7)' and insert 'subsection (6)'.

No. 10, in page 28, line 9, leave out '21A(3)' and insert '21A(2A), (3)'.—[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

Schedule 4

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendments made: No. 11, in page 35, line 25, leave out from 'after' to end of line and insert '"section" insert "4(6),"'.

No. 12, in page 36, line 10, at end insert—

'Inquiries Act 2005 (c.12)

Order for Third Reading read.

6.17 pm

Mr. Hanson: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have had a positive debate—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. If hon. Members are not staying for the debate, could they leave quickly and quietly?

Mr. Hanson: Over the course of its consideration, on Second Reading, in Committee—particularly given that there was a Committee of the whole House—and on Report, we have had a useful discussion about the principles of the Bill. I commend right hon. and hon. Members on their valuable contributions to today's debate. Contrary to assertions made by Members, the Government have listened to some of the points that have been made and have tabled amendments that have made a material difference to the nature of the Bill. As with every piece of legislation, it is not possible to accept every amendment or every point made in the debate. There will be differences between us, but I have moved on several points and I am pleased to see that those have been incorporated in the Third Reading of the Bill.

As right hon. and hon. Members will know, there is a clear path open to us now on Northern Ireland's political development to ensure that, as has been stated by the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach, by the end of 2006 we bring about clear political progress for the political organisations in Northern Ireland and for the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland. It is now for local politicians to take forward that task of devolution. I am pleased that we are meeting today, in the week that the Assembly reconvened following the passing of earlier legislation; that we have in place Assembly Members who are signed up again to take part in the Assembly; and that we had debates on the Floor of the Assembly this week, with participation from Members from across the Assembly. I believe, as do the Government, that the Assembly offers a better future for Northern Ireland. Now, through the Bill, we are in a position to take forward the possible next stages of devolution in Northern Ireland by devolving criminal justice and policing.

Given what has been said today, no one fails to accept that there are still major hurdles to overcome and that work must be done, not least to get the proper Executive-led Assembly back in place by November. Additionally, difficulties are self-evident to anyone who has been involved in our debates on the possible devolution of criminal justice and policing. However, the Bill sets a clear path before the House: devolution in October or November—I hope—at the very latest with the Executive back in place. At some point in the future, we will have the framework and opportunity for the devolution of criminal justice and policing. For the sake of having the discussion again, the famous triple—or perhaps now even quadruple—lock is in place whereby the Assembly, the Secretary of State and the Government must agree with the House of Commons if such devolution is to take place. In all essence, however, the framework is in place.

The framework is in place because, hopefully, no one can deny that there is progress towards a political solution in Northern Ireland, however slow that might seem. The latest IMC report of 26 April states that the Provisional IRA leadership is committed to a peaceful path. There is work to be done and efforts to be undertaken, but we must realise that there is movement and that Northern Ireland today is unrecognisable from how it was at the height of the troubles in recent years.

The Bill makes progress on the devolution of policing and criminal justice, but it does much more than that. It takes forward the modernisation of our electoral system so that we will be brought in line, over a staged period, with the rest of the United Kingdom's electoral law on political party funding. It also modernises the electoral canvass and allows for the appointment and operation of the chief electoral officer. Again, it does so to put Northern Ireland in a fair frame of progress towards proper elections and electoral law.

The Bill also provides for an extension to the order-making power under the Northern Ireland Arms Decommissioning Act 1997 to facilitate the continued decommissioning of loyalist weapons. That issue has been a major bone of contention today, but I will press, along with hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) and DUP Members, for the decommissioning of loyalist weapons. The Bill puts in place a framework to give us extra time, should we need it.

The Bill will also make important contributions to the existing criminal justice and policing regimes in Northern Ireland. It will give investigators and prosecutors new powers to tackle serious and organised crime. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who is new to his position, will be taking forward those measures in due course to ensure that we do what we say we will do, namely, crack down on organised crime and criminality in Northern Ireland. We will continue to take the effective steps that have been seen over the past few weeks to tackle the cross-border smuggling of petrol and cigarettes, and other problems.

An issue close to the heart of the hon. Member for North Down is central to the Bill. The Bill provides corporation sole status to the office of the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. I gave her an assurance that we would do that when we were considering the on-the-runs legislation in Committee and, following her representations, we have done so. We have responded to her concerns, so—dare I say?—the Government have listened. We have also responded to other points that members of that Committee raised, albeit not all of them.

There are several other key aspects of the Bill that we should consider. Only today I moved a new clause on sustainable development, which is now part of the Bill, to ensure that we protect our environment for our children and grandchildren. We have introduced important measures to safeguard the future of the environment and are giving legal status to the £59 million investment that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has brought forward to support sustainable development. That means, in real life, that we can use the £59 million to do important things for the people of Northern Ireland. That includes putting solar panels—this is part of my political domain—in new social build housing, with 600 panels this year and 600 next year, to help the environment. Those are the challenges on improving our environment.

The Bill also contains key provisions for a single wholesale electricity market, with opportunities for new investment, new efficiencies, new economies of scale and security of supply—the things that matter to the people on the island of Ireland as a whole, both north and south of the border. It is a pragmatic approach, welcomed by all hon. Members, to support the economic well-being of Northern Ireland in the future. The Bill achieves what it set out to achieve—it helps us to make progress on the devolution of policing; it modernises our election law; it provides support for sustainable development; and it looks at giving extra support to tackling crime. It is a good Bill.

On behalf of the ministerial team, I thank the many officials from the Northern Ireland Office and the devolved Executive, reporting to direct rule Ministers, for the time and effort that they put in over many weeks, months and, in some cases, years, to bring the clauses to fruition. A tremendous amount of work went on behind the scenes. As a Minister, it is important that I recognise that.

The Bill will add to the value of Northern Ireland and add strength to devolution. I commend it to the House.

6.26 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson: By and large, we welcome the Bill, although we have tried to improve it in various ways. I thank the Minister for the way in which he introduced it and took it through Committee. It has been possible to explore it in great detail, and he was always willing to take interventions. It does credit to the House that we have analysed it in that way, in particular on the Floor of the House, which has been useful in part.

We have some concerns. We were worried about abolishing the annual canvass and tried to put a time scale on that so that there would be canvasses in 2015 at the latest and every 10 years after that. We were also a little concerned about the ability of the chief electoral officer, working with the Secretary of State, to cancel those canvasses, but we are where we are and we recognise the need to modernise the system. The important thing is that we have a full register of electors in Northern Ireland.

We were a bit concerned about the donations for political purposes, although we did not touch on that greatly. We would have liked a time limit on donations from the Republic of Ireland, but the Government turned that down. I regret that. We tabled an amendment to address that, but sadly we did not reach it because of the lack of time. However, those donations remain a concern, for obvious reasons.

The biggest issue covered by the Bill is the devolution of policing and justice. Although we have no objection to that in principle, we have discussed it at length and are worried that responsibility for it could fall into the wrong hands. I recognise that we have the double-double lock, the treble lock or the quadruple lock—or whatever it is—and that the Assembly does not have to accept responsibility for policing and justice. However, whether or not policing and justice are devolved, the points raised in connection with that are extremely important.

I spoke about my experiences in South Armagh, but did not get a chance to expand on those because of the 6 o'clock deadline. When I visited it last week—I was pleased that the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee also visited it last week, and that the Chairman confirmed that my experiences were his—it was stressed that there had been a huge improvement in the area. However, it can by no means be considered normal when the police cannot go out on their own. That is not acceptable in any part of the United Kingdom. Whether certain people in that area like it or not, it is part of the United Kingdom. One of the most alarming things was that the police told me that the MP for that area would not engage with them. That is unacceptable, especially when that person is a Member of the Assembly, could become a Minister, and could become the Minister with responsibility for the police. However, at this point that person will not engage with them. Moving on from that, we wanted to try to make it a little more secure that people holding office in Northern Ireland actually supported the rule of law.

The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) mentioned that when he did a television programme and asked a Sinn Fein supporter whether they would report a crime, he gave as an example the crime of rape. If someone had such knowledge and did not report it, they would not be upholding the rule of law. It is not acceptable for such a person to sit in government. It is unfortunate that the Minister did not accept our amendments in that respect. We pressed them to the vote and did not win, but we made the point. It was not a watertight measure, but it would have moved the situation in the right direction.

Again, we have not discussed the electricity market in great detail on the Floor of the House, although we discussed it upstairs. My understanding—this is not a criticism; it has been a good start—is that the Bill does not create the wholesale electricity market, as it is headlined in the Bill. According to the discussions I have had with the authorities in Northern Ireland, it will provide the ability to coordinate the regulation of the market in Northern Ireland with the regulation of the market in the Republic of Ireland. That may be a useful step but, in order for consumers in Northern Ireland to get the full benefit of that, they need to go further and to have a true market covering the whole of Ireland and, indeed, possibly the whole of Ireland and the United Kingdom. A bigger market, especially if they can move towards a freer market, will lead to lower electricity prices.

I welcome the possibility of financial assistance for energy purposes, which is in clause 23, especially renewable energy. It is important that we develop renewable energy, first, because it is renewable and helps to reduce emissions of poisonous gases, and secondly, because it would provide security of supply. We have seen throughout the world a rather unsettled market in primary sources of energy. If we look at what is happening in certain areas of South America and at the behaviour of Russia on one or two occasions, it is clear that we need a more secure energy supply in this country.

I pay tribute to the answer that the Prime Minister gave during Prime Minister's questions today. He gave a balanced and positive view of energy policy. I hope that he has the courage to pursue that policy against the opposition of certain members of his own party. It is important that he does so. I give a word of warning on clause 23. In Great Britain, we have not developed renewable energy as well as we should. It still provides a very small percentage of the electricity that we use. If we are going to pursue that in Northern Ireland, we need to do more not only on energy conservation, but on the development of renewable energy. It is not being developed in this country quickly enough. I hope that we can use the Bill to study why that has not been the case and to move on renewable energy a little more quickly in Northern Ireland than we have in Great Britain.

I have made just a few observations; perhaps other hon. Members want to contribute. By and large, we welcome the Bill. There are not many of my colleagues here tonight, but they have contributed a great deal in Committee, particularly the Chairman of the Select Committee. I thank them for their help and support during the passage of the Bill.

Mr. McGrady: Generally, my party welcomes the Bill, which is more miscellaneous than most of us expected. The Minister said that he has achieved what he set out to achieve, and that seems to have been his attitude every time that he saw a new draft or provision. None the less, the Bill usefully deals with the multitude of issues mentioned by the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson). Some of its provisions are essential, some are useful and some are convenient but, none the less, they all contribute to the whole.

On behalf of my party, may I pay tribute to Ministers who have moved on from the Northern Ireland Office, hopefully to greater things as a result of the fine training that we gave them and the multi-faceted experience that they gained? May I welcome to the Front Bench the new Ministers with whom we hope to do good business in the months ahead? The Bill is interesting, as it does not have a central theme and changes gear in each part. I was disappointed that we did not manage to debate some of our new clauses because of the 6 o'clock deadline. That is especially true of the new clause that deals with the powers of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. Notwithstanding the lack of debate, perhaps the Minister can take on board our efforts to give the commission powers that are available to other human rights commissions, especially in the south of Ireland, so that it can act in accordance with European Union requirements on human rights. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission does not have investigatory powers to pursue people and papers.

Mr. Hanson: Given that we failed to reach new clause 9, may I give my hon. Friend an assurance that we seek to implement the results of our consultation on the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission at an appropriate time? His proposal may not have found favour today, but its broad principles should receive Government support in future.

Mr. McGrady: I thank the Minister for giving an undertaking, on the record, to pursue the matter with more urgency. I recall that the issue was to be examined six years ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been lenient with the hon. Gentleman, who has received more than he expected. We are now debating the contents of the Bill.

Mr. McGrady: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is no harm in making the attempt, but I accept your rap on the knuckles.

I thank the Minister not just for his intervention, but for the commitments, undertakings and reviews that he has promised in the months ahead. The atmosphere in Committee and throughout proceedings on the Bill is indicative of a new understanding or tolerance across the Floor of the House. I experienced it, too, when we debated the Northern Ireland Act 2006. A clear understanding of the needs and requirements of the two communities in Northern Ireland was given positive expression, and I hope that that will be translated substantively and directly to the new Assembly, which was reconvened on Monday and Tuesday this week. I am sure that it is appropriate to say in the House that we wish the Assembly a fair wind in dealing with the many difficult problems that it faces to enable people to move from entrenched positions so that they can accommodate one another. The contents of this and other Bills will assist that process. Hopefully, this will be the last such Bill to come before the House, because all the matters that it covers, with the exception of reserved matters, will be dealt with by an Executive of the Northern Ireland parties on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Donaldson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's comments about the new Assembly. I also welcome the participation of the SDLP in the proceedings of the Assembly earlier this week. Will he join me in expressing regret that one party—Sinn Fein—which absents itself from this House, was also absent on Tuesday from the debate on the economy? Is it not time that it ended its abstentionism?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) again that we are discussing precisely the contents of the Bill today.

Mr. McGrady: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That saves me thinking of a suitable response to the last intervention. I shall simply say, "Noted and agreed."

Some of the comments made on Report disturbed me. It seemed as though certain parties were flagging up new pre-conditions for the effective devolution of policing and justice. Without going into detail because of the time factor, I urge the Government to do all in their power not to fall into the trap that they have fallen into repeatedly with demands from Sinn Fein and, with respect, demands from the Democratic Unionist party, which are pre-conditions to further progress. The whole thrust and ethos of making progress in Northern Ireland is that no party has a veto on progress over other parties. That has been neglected or severely damaged in the past two or three years.

Even today, a certain pre-condition seemed to be imposed by the DUP, which sounded to me like an everlasting ban on Sinn Fein being accepted into government. That sounded a negative note—the only negative note. I know the concerns that DUP Members have, because I have exactly the same concerns. We cannot have people in government who do not fully, honestly and openly support law and order. However, that should not be used in a dramatic way in terms of the purity of the situation.

It is difficult when one is dealing with human relationships and things evolve and change daily. We should not box ourselves in with pre-conditions. For instance, the Government allowed Sinn Fein to say that it would not join the Policing Board until the DUP agreed to the devolution of policing and justice. That is a crazy situation, in which we should not allow ourselves to be involved. We need openness to achieve progress in Northern Ireland. The Bill, with its various provisions covering elections, funding, donations and the matters that we discussed today regarding policing and justice, will contribute to a healthy debate in Northern Ireland. I hope that we can translate the very good atmosphere in the House today to the Floor of the Assembly. If we do, the hope of achieving full, lasting and proper devolution to Northern Ireland will be greatly enhanced.

Lembit Öpik: When I think of the range of the Bill—sustainable development, policing and justice, criminal damage, registration of electors, children, commitment to the rule of law, powers of the Human Rights Commission, primacy in intelligence gathering, donations to political parties and so on—it is amazing that it is possible to be out of order on any of the subjects that we have covered, but we have even achieved that.

I noted the Minister's praise of his team. He has made some terrible mistakes by not listening more to the sage advice offered to him by Opposition parties. I know from personal experience how wonderful the Northern Ireland Office team is, and no doubt they support him superbly. I am sure that they agree that the Minister should have taken on some of our amendments, given their fine judgments on these matters.

The Minister has shown some signs of listening in the past few hours. If in some small way we have opened his ears to be more inclusive in his politics with regard to Northern Ireland, then the debate on Report and Third Reading will have been worthwhile.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) highlighted some issues about which he is concerned. I broadly agree with him and share the same concerns, which I do not need to repeat.

[Lembit Öpik]

I remain concerned that there is a weakness in the 50:50:50 process in securing cross-community support, and I am worried that that will once again get in the way in the months ahead. I hope that the Minister will at least take on board and consider our points on that matter.

I am also concerned about the census. We have made a mistake by allowing such a preposterously long period in keeping the census up to date. All the good work and the enormous investment of time and money which has been carried out to make sure that we have the most accurate electoral register in the United Kingdom will fade away because of the length of time between electoral censuses. Once again, I hope that the Minister will reflect on that point, and if my rather gloomy prediction turns out to be right, perhaps the Government will revisit the enormously long period between censuses.

Finally, I recently saw a fine show in Majorca called, "Pirates"—I attended to help raise money for Great Ormond Street hospital. As I watched the show, I thought about how this Government plunder the goodwill of Northern Ireland politicians—some of us have covered this particular portfolio for almost a decade. They have stolen money from students by introducing a truly unpopular method of student support, and they have also threatened the Northern Irish people with enormous hikes in their utility bills in order to undo damage which was not caused by the citizens themselves.

If the politicians of Northern Ireland use this Bill and other legislation as a spur to restart the Stormont Assembly, then Northern Ireland will not have to endure the injustices that are endlessly meted out to them by the Government as a whole rather than by this particular Minister.

Mr. Hanson indicated assent.

Lembit Öpik: Look how quickly the Minister is willing to blame his colleagues as he seeks to protect himself.

There will be no hiding place if the Assembly is re-established. I respectfully point out once again that there is a powerful incentive for Northern Ireland politicians to regard this Bill, which will soon be enacted, and other legislation, as an opportunity to provide a firewall between the legislation that the Government will impose through Statutory Instrument Committees and the alternative legislation that Northern Ireland politicians are collectively likely to introduce in the Assembly. As the Bill passes into law, I hope that the DUP and others find it easier to work together, even with those parties that they still distrust and unquestionably dislike, because it is surely in the greater interests of the citizens whom they represent for those differences to be managed and Northern Ireland politics to be established on a devolutionary footing, which I hope and believe that we all want to see.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me for two minutes. I will try to keep my word, although I did not give it.

I was surprised by the remarks of the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady). He has been preaching for a very long time that we must all bow to the Anglo-Irish agreement, which he says is the great test. The Anglo-Irish agreement—[HON. MEMBERS: "The Belfast agreement."] Whatever one likes to call it—Good Friday, bad Friday or rotten Friday. I want to say to the House that this is where the government of Northern Ireland, and what we do, should be decided. It should not be decided by votes taken in the south of Ireland and then people scrambling out every time there is difficulty saying, "The whole of Ireland agreed to this." The whole of Ireland has nothing to do with it. This is the United Kingdom and we have a right to decide what we do.

We are making no pre-conditions. Everybody knows what I have said; I have been saying it for a long time. I have been castigated and kicked in this House, treated as a leper, refused admittance to Downing street for two years and six months, and so on and so forth, and I am still saying the same thing. The Prime Minister said the same thing from the Front Bench. If he wants to break his word to the people of Northern Ireland, we will not be breaking our word to the people who have voted for us.

We are in great difficulties because on Monday and Tuesday we discovered that the Ulster Unionist party had entered into an agreement with the Progressive Unionist party. Any Minister of this Government who is prepared to defend the PUP has only to read what the report that Government Ministers love to read—the Independent Monitoring Commission report—has said about it. All that I can say is that we have a tougher road to travel, and we had better remember that. I hope that this House will remember that, by passing this Bill without amendments that would have been useful to us in the battle to keep to democracy, it is really responsible for what happens.

I think that I have exceeded my time, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Thank you.

6.51 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson: I thank the Minister for the way in which he has led throughout the various stages of the passage of the Bill. I join other hon. Members in welcoming the two new Ministers who are sitting with him on the Front Bench. I hope that they have a profitable and enjoyable time in Northern Ireland. I also hope that they get an opportunity to get out and see its many beauties, most of which are confined to east Belfast—

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Giant's Causeway.

Dr. McCrea: South Antrim.

Mr. Robinson: Any other bids?

Let me go beyond the welcomes to say that I appreciate that the Government have made some amendments that improve the Bill. Should the circumstances ever arise whereby policing and justice powers can be devolved, my party, regardless of what any other party does, believes in the primacy of the electoral mandate. As a party, we are mandated to seek devolution for Northern Ireland. We want that devolution to be stable, accountable, effective and efficient. Those were the principles that we enunciated for many years. I believe that we have moved towards that, making some progress along the way, but barriers still remain. The principal barrier has been Sinn Fein and its relationship with the IRA, to which it is inextricably linked. As a party that was entitled to be in government under existing legislation, it was clearly necessary that it met the standards of democracy, that it decommissioned all its weapons, and that it ensured that there was a complete and unalterable end to all of its paramilitary and criminal activity.

Those are all essentials for government. They are even more essential in relation to the devolution of policing and justice suggested in the Bill. When the last report by the Independent Monitoring Commission was published, we said openly in this House that some progress had been made, but that there were still grey areas and loose ends that needed to be addressed. So I am sure that the Minister will accept that many of us were shocked when a spanner was thrown into the works this week by the irrational decision of the Ulster Unionist party to embrace the Progressive Unionist party, whose members are the spokespersons for the UVF.

I knew instinctively that the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) would be opposed to that marriage, and that was confirmed during the debate. The relationship undermines her, however, and I regret these circumstances because there will now be a mountain to climb in regard to devolution unless these matters can be undone. We will await the ruling of the Speaker of the Northern Ireland Assembly on this, but the Speaker can rule in favour of the decision of the Ulster Unionist party Assembly group only if she believes that that group is a separate political party. The party's representatives indicated that they had formed a new political party. That is what the Speaker was instructed by the Ulster Unionist party's Assembly representatives—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not quite clear how the hon. Gentleman's remarks relate to the content of the Bill. Perhaps he could make that clear.

Mr. Robinson: The Bill covers a number of miscellaneous matters relating to the government of Northern Ireland and matters that will, in due course, be able to be devolved to the Government there. Unfortunately, that Government is less likely to be formed because of the situation that has developed in the Assembly. However, I want to give Front-Benchers some time to wind up the debate.

I will round off my remarks by saying that this issue must be addressed, because the conditions remain the same, whether we are talking about paramilitarism from a Unionist background or a nationalist background. We are not prepared to be in government with those who are linked to paramilitary organisations. It would be ironic if, in the months or years ahead, Sinn Fein and the republican movement were to be given a clean bill of health and the Government could proceed, only for the Ulster Unionist party to delay that process because of a relationship with a paramilitary organisation. Those issues have to be dealt with; they cannot be ducked.

This relationship has certainly not been formed for the altruistic purpose that the hon. Lady was told by the leader of her party, who was no doubt squirming when he said that the purpose was to try to take the UVF away from its paramilitary activities. The purpose was self-serving: it was to try to increase the number of Ministries that the Ulster Unionist party would get. That has not worked, and it will not work. Indeed, my party would have ensured that Sinn Fein would not have got a third Ministry. There were at least four strategies to ensure that that would not happen. The Ulster Unionist party was not robbing Sinn Fein of a Ministry. It thought that it was robbing the DUP, but it will find out that it has not.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Draft Legal Services Bill (Joint Committee)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Lords Message of 11th May relating to a Joint Committee of both Houses to consider and report on any draft Legal Services Bill presented to both Houses by a Minister of the Crown be now considered.

That this House concurs with the Lords that it is expedient that a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons be appointed to consider and report on any draft Legal Services Bill presented to both Houses by a Minister of the Crown, and that the Committee should report on the draft Bill by 25th July 2006.

That the Committee shall have power—

(i) to send for persons, papers and records;

(ii) to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House;

(iii) to report from time to time;

(iv) to appoint specialist advisers; and

(v) to adjourn from place to place within the United Kingdom.

That the quorum of the Committee shall be two; and

That Mr David Burrowes, Michael Jabez Foster, John Hemming, Stephen Hesford, Mr David Kidney and Emily Thornberry be members of the Committee.—[Mr. Roy.]

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand that the hon. Gentleman has to make a speech.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is this speech required on my objection to motion 3 on the Order Paper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should indicate briefly why he wishes to object.

6.58 pm

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Thank you for your helpful guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This is a procedural motion of far-reaching constitutional importance that should be considered in much greater detail, rather than being put through on the nod in this way. We should have a full debate on the merits and demerits of the issue, and it is for that reason that I wish to object.

Question put:—

The House proceeded to a Division; but no Member being willing to act as Teller, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Ayes had it.

Question agreed to.

Rana Faruqui

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Roy.]

7.2 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am grateful to the Speaker for giving me this opportunity to raise the case of a daughter of a constituent. I want to speak about the brutal murder of Rana Faruqui, the handling of that case by Thames Valley police and the wider issues raised by it.

In 2003, Rana Faruqui was a bright, attractive, lively 35-year-old working in IT as a business analyst. At work, she met Stephen Griffiths. A relationship started. Stephen Griffiths moved into her home. Several incidents of domestic violence followed, the relationship faltered, and Stephen Griffiths left her home. After he left her home, several incidents of him stalking Rana Faruqui took place. On 21 July, Rana Faruqui reported by telephone to Thames Valley police that the brake pipes on her car had been cut. Three days later, on 24 July 2003, she went physically to Slough police station and spoke to the police about the fact that those brake pipes had been cut. That report passed from inbox to inbox, and from officer to officer, for 10 whole days. On Saturday 2 August 2003, Stephen Griffiths stabbed and brutally murdered Rana Faruqui.

I have absolutely no doubt that Thames Valley police failed Rana. They should have taken the issue of the cutting of the brake pipes more seriously. Sadly, Rana's family, having had to face the tragedy of her brutal murder, are left with the feeling that had Thames Valley police acted differently, she might be alive today.

I am very conscious that there has been a full investigation of the case by Thames Valley police, and that a misconduct hearing in relation to one senior officer is still due to take place. Despite parliamentary privilege I do not intend to name any individual officers, but I hope the Minister will agree that the bare facts that I have outlined raise a degree of concern about the handling of the issue by Thames Valley police. They raise wider issues as well, however, and it is on those that I wish to concentrate.

When Rana Faruqui's mother Carol came to see me with other members of her family, she was obviously distressed at what had happened to her daughter and at the suffering that the family had experienced following Rana's death, but she was also anxious to ensure that other families were not put through the same distress. She wanted to try to ensure that issues of domestic violence, and particularly of stalking, were taken more seriously by Thames Valley police, and that any lessons from the case were learnt not only by them but by police forces across the country.

I am grateful to the acting chief constable of Thames Valley police, Sara Thornton, for giving me information about what the force has done following the case. She has not only written to me, but taken the time and trouble to speak to me about it. As a result of my conversation with her, I hope to be able to visit one of the domestic violence units in the Thames Valley area. However, as I have said, I have absolutely no doubt that Rana was failed by Thames Valley police. That raises a number of issues about the approach that the force takes to domestic violence, and the attitude of officers to such violence.

In 2004-05, there were 14,793 cases of domestic violence in the Thames Valley area. That is an increase of about 15 per cent. on the number of cases in 2003-04. I am aware that since then the Government have introduced a Bill to deal with domestic violence, and that more recently the Home Office has issued guidance to police forces on the handling of domestic violence cases. The acting chief constable tells me that Thames Valley police has adopted a rather more rigorous approach of risk assessment

"in all domestic violence or 'stalker' type cases", which are now

"reviewed and reassessed by specialist Domestic Violence Officers."

Investigation management is subject to strict timetables.

"Cases which fall within the risk assessment process are given added scrutiny in respect of 'follow-up' with the emphasis being on early intervention and positive action".

That is what is happening now, of course; it was not in operation when Rana Faruqui reported those incidents to the police.

It is important to stress that, by all accounts, Rana was not a shrinking violet who did not know what to do, and did not take action when the incidents happened. She did report them to the police. We all know that many cases of domestic violence are not reported to the police, but she did report those incidents, and the stalking incidents. I think she rightly expected appropriate action to be taken, but sadly it was not.

Despite the action that has now been taken by Thames Valley police, the case raises several issues. The first is the general attitude of the police to such cases. I want to separate the issues of domestic violence and stalking. As I have said, the Government have taken action on domestic violence issues through their Bill and the guidance that they have now issued to police forces, but I am not convinced that as much emphasis has been placed on the stalking issue, which I believe should be taken very seriously. I suspect and fear that a number of such incidents are not taken as seriously as they should be. In some cases, the police's attitude may well be, "It's just somebody who has broken up with her boyfriend, does not want him around and has rung the police to try to get rid of him", but in many others, that is not what is happening.

There are individuals out there like Stephen Griffiths. It subsequently emerged that although he could at times be very charming, he was also very manipulative and had had a number of broken relationships before he met Rana—relationships in which domestic violence incidents had occurred. So a pattern was being repeated but sadly, there was no evidence: no reporting of that pattern on which Thames Valley police could draw in assessing that case.

I have some questions for the Minister concerning the seriousness with which stalking is being addressed. Have the Government issued any guidance on dealing with stalking? What is the attitude taken by junior officers, in particular, when they first encounter such incidents? When a junior officer first deals with a reported stalking incident, it is crucial that they take it seriously. As I said earlier, Thames Valley police told me about the various steps that they have taken in dealing with domestic violence, such as risk assessment and the use of specialist domestic violence officers, but they kick in only if the initial report is taken seriously and treated seriously.

That leads me to the very real issue of the training our police officers, their understanding of such incidents and their recognition—or not—of their seriousness. I realise that the 14,793 domestic violence incidents that Thames Valley police had to deal with in 2004-05 is a large number. But in each case where it was shown that such violence had indeed taken place, there was a victim and someone who had acted in a criminal way against them. The police must take a serious approach to such cases.

I want to ask the Minister about the training of police officers in dealing with stalking. Stalking hits the headlines when it happens to a celebrity and such cases have been reported to the police, but it does not happen just to celebrities. Rana Faruqui was not a celebrity, but she was stalked by Stephen Griffiths, with tragic consequences. What are the police doing to ensure that sufficient training is given to officers, so that they understand the seriousness of such offences and behaviour, and that they recognise it and report it appropriately? They need to ensure that the action that has so far been taken can kick in, that proper risk assessment takes place, and that officers put the emphasis on early intervention, in order to ensure that the tragic consequences of Rana's case are not repeated.

I want also to ask about guidance from the Home Office itself and from the Association of Chief Police Officers. I hope that the lessons that the Thames Valley police have learned following this incident will be shared with other forces throughout the country. One problem that we have is that police forces often do not share information with each other in an effort to deal with such issues. There is no lack of good intent in that regard: it just happens; there is no culture of sharing information. I have always been of the view that, if someone finds a good way of dealing with a problem, they should share it, because doing so is to the benefit of everybody. There are lessons to be learned, and they should be shared with other forces.

Is the Home Office doing enough to deal with stalking? Is it introducing guidance and proper measures at police force level? As I said earlier, Rana's mother and the rest of her family are very keen that others should not have to go through the suffering that they have gone through, purely because no lessons are learned and no action is taken by Thames Valley or other forces. They have not just sat around or even just talked to me about it. Rana's sister went over to the US to investigate the action taken there, and she sent me an interesting set of papers about San Diego county, which has established a stalking strike force, a multi-disciplinary approach to the issue. An article by Wayne Maxey, a criminal investigator affiliated with the stalking unit of the San Diego's district attorney's office, describes it as > "A multi-disciplinary approach...one in which both criminal justice and mental health approaches come together to address the problem."

The Americans find that approach most effective. The article continues:

> "The Strike Force strive to evaluate carefully each case and develop effective case management strategies."

I have here copies of security recommendations for stalking victims and the stalking strike force victim handbook—the information that is given to victims of stalking on what they can do to help to ensure their safety. The evidence from the strike force suggests the need for early intervention, to identify where there is a serious risk and to take appropriate action.

I am happy to share the information with the Minister. I would also be happy to meet him and share further details of the case that I am not able to share with him in the time available tonight. Rana Faruqui was brutally murdered, despite the fact that she had reported the incidents of stalking and—crucially, in my view—the cutting of the brake cables of her car to the police. Thames Valley did nothing about that report for 10 days, at the end of which she was dead. Thames Valley police failed Rana, and I want to ensure that nobody else is failed in that way, by Thames Valley or other forces; that the lessons from this case are learned by others; and that the police take cases of domestic violence and, crucially, stalking seriously. Such cases must not be dismissed as women reporting things that have not taken place or trying to get rid of a boyfriend who is being a bit difficult. When someone goes to the police, they must be treated properly and seriously. The police must recognise the danger that can ensue and take action accordingly. We owe it to Rana and her family to ensure that the lessons are learned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I must briefly interrupt the debate. I have to report an error in the number reported as having voted in the No Lobby in the deferred Division on the Joint Committee on Conventions. The number voting No was 20, not 19 as reported. The Clerk will arrange for the record to be corrected.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on securing this important debate, raising the issue of domestic violence and bringing such an appalling crime to the attention of the House. I also congratulate her on the tone of her speech, which was very moving in parts.

I know that the right hon. Lady has specific concerns about the police handling of domestic homicides, and about Thames Valley police force in particular. I am aware of the tragic circumstances of the death of Rana Faruqui, in August 2003. After suffering months of stalking and harassment from her ex-partner, including the brake pipes on her car being cut, she was fatally stabbed by him, while tending to her horses at her stables. I offer my sympathy to all who knew Miss Faruqui.

The terrifying facts of this case and other incidents of domestic violence demonstrate the importance of ensuring that the response to the needs of victims of domestic violence is handled earlier and effectively, to reduce the risk of incidents like this occurring, as the right hon. Lady pointed out. She will appreciate that I have been advised that I cannot talk about the handling of individual cases, including this one, but I will outline the comprehensive improvements that have been made by the Thames Valley police force to its handling of domestic violence.

At the outset, I assure the right hon. Lady that I should, of course, be happy to meet her in my office to discuss matters that it is not possible to raise now. Stalking is one of those matters, and I look forward to her contacting me so that we can organise such a meeting.

In addition, I shall outline a wide range of measures that the Government have instigated through the national delivery plan for domestic violence. Sweeping changes in case handling have been made across the criminal justice system, including in the police, the Crown Prosecution Service and the courts. Those changes will aid victims and help to prevent cases such as those in the Thames Valley area and beyond. The plan also highlights action to ensure the early identification of victims and perpetrators. In addition, it offers focused support for victims and the better management of perpetrators.

This debate gives me an opportunity to say a few things. As a new Minister at the Home Office, I was shocked when I was briefed on the scale of the problem that we face. For instance, the House will be appalled to learn the following: that, on average, two women a week are killed in the UK by a male partner or former partner; that in 2003-04 nearly 40 per cent. of all female homicide victims were killed by their current or ex-partner, compared with about 5 per cent. of male homicide victims; that about one in four women and one in six men have been victims of domestic violence since the age of 16, although women are clearly likely to suffer greater injury and be classed as chronic victims; that 89 per cent. of those suffering four or more attacks are women, and that one incident is reported to the police every minute. Moreover, as the right hon. Member for Maidenhead noted, there were more than 14,000 such incidents in the Thames Valley area in 2004-05.

In addition to the human suffering that is caused by domestic violence, the costs to our economy are staggering. In 2001, domestic violence in England and Wales was estimated to cost a total of £23 billion, of which £3 billion was spent on public services and £2.7 billion was absorbed by employers and workers. The cost of human and emotional suffering was put at £17 billion. In addition, the criminal justice system spent £1 billion on domestic violence cases, and £300 million was spent by civil legal services.

In 90 per cent. of incidents involving domestic violence, children are in the same or the next room. Domestic violence also has worrying links to pregnancy: 30 per cent. of domestic violence starts during pregnancy, and existing violence often escalates. Domestic violence accounts for 17 per cent. of all violent crime in the UK. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Maidenhead probably knows those facts better than I do, but they are another reason why we should welcome the opportunity that this debate gives us to state them in the House.

Those statistics tell a terrible story, as is highlighted by the case at the heart of this debate, but that story is made far worse when we realise that behind each statistic is a life, and often many lives. Those lives are damaged and sometimes destroyed by the cruel and barbaric acts that are committed—and as a man I have to say this—mainly by men. I recognise that men and same-sex couples also experience domestic violence, but women are far more likely to experience physical or sexual violence at the hands of men.

However, I wish to reassure the House that the Government are facing up to our responsibilities, and I should like to outline some of the major steps that we are taking to respond to this most insidious of crimes in all parts of the country, including in the Thames Valley area. The Government take domestic violence very seriously, and that is why we have set up the inter-ministerial group on domestic violence. It is chaired by Baroness Scotland, and draws ministerial membership from across all the major Government Departments. The group performance manages the delivery plan and monitors its progress quarterly.

As the right hon. Lady noted, we passed the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 in November of that year. The biggest overhaul of domestic violence legislation for 30 years, that Act gives tough new powers to the police and the courts to tackle offenders, while ensuring that victims get the support and protection that they need. We hope that that protection will help people across the country, including in the Thames Valley area.

The 2004 Act gives greater protection to victims and children, and encourages them to stand up for their right to live without fear of violence. The measures that it contains have been rolling out in stages since March 2005.

I turn now to the specific concerns about Thames Valley police expressed by the right hon. Lady. I should like to reassure the House that that force have initiated a fundamental overhaul of their policies and procedures in response to domestic violence cases. The Thames Valley police domestic violence project is nearing completion; the main changes have been implemented and the force is consolidating the improvements in its routine business. After some of the awful things that we have seen and that she highlighted, I hope that lessons have been learned and I trust that such initiatives offer some comfort and reassurance.

The improvements include the establishment of public protection units throughout Thames Valley police. Those specialist units focus on protecting communities from the most dangerous offenders and provide expertise in cases involving the most vulnerable members of our society. The force's existing domestic violence units have been incorporated in the public protection units and augmented with additional investment and resources. Specialist domestic violence officers now review all domestic violence incidents.

A comprehensive structured risk assessment process has been implemented. All operational officers have received training in identifying domestic violence cases and in the use of the risk indicator tool to assist their investigation and management of the case. Every case is assessed by a specialist domestic violence unit officer to ensure that high-risk cases are identified early—a point made by the right hon. Lady—and given added priority and resources.

[Mr. Vernon Coaker]

We need to ensure that action on stalking is included in those procedures. The right hon. Lady asked about guidance in such cases. The Association of Chief Police Officers has issued police forces with guidance on harassment, which includes stalking, so the right hon. Lady can be reassured about that issue.

The changes in the Thames Valley force are part of a much wider overhaul that has been instigated in all police forces. In November 2004, ACPO issued comprehensive guidance to all forces in England and Wales, including Thames Valley, about the investigation of domestic violence cases, including Thames Valley. The accompanying training programme covers identification and flagging of cases of domestic violence by the police; officer response at the scene of the incident to protect victims and to gather evidence; managing the investigation and building a prosecution case; protecting the victim as the case progresses through the criminal justice system; and how to engage effectively in multi-agency working. I was most interested in the information from America provided by a relative of the family about multi-agency working. Perhaps the right hon. Lady and I could discuss that further when we meet. The police alone cannot tackle domestic violence; it requires a partnership response, although I am very aware that turning those words into reality is something else again.

Mrs. May: Before I comment on that point, I apologise to the Minister for not welcoming him to his new post in the Home Office.

The San Diego experience is one of the interesting points that I should like to discuss with the Minister. The scheme was set up on a voluntary basis and has managed to get around many of the administrative barriers that can get in the way of a multi-agency approach, which then fails to operate properly, as the Minister said.

Mr. Coaker: I thank the right hon. Lady for her welcome. We can certainly discuss the issue she raises. I am well aware that bureaucracy sometimes gets in the way of service delivery and in cases such as these we need to make sure that what we say in an office translates into reality on the ground for people who suffer, or may suffer, domestic violence.

The training programme that I outlined is a major initiative in each police force area, including Thames Valley, and a target has been set to ensure that every operational officer in every police force in England and Wales will be a graduate of the programme by 2008. To complement it, every new recruit in every force will be trained about domestic violence as part of their mandatory training, as they have been since April 2005. Again, Thames Valley is obviously included in that programme. Such training is crucial to changing the culture—changing awareness and attitudes. All those things are important and will take longer than a training programme, but the programme is vital none the less.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) is present in the Chamber. She has also taken a keen interest in these matters, including when she was a Home Office Minister, and we are building on much of the work in which she was involved.

Every police force in England and Wales now also has a domestic violence co-ordinator—so the Thames Valley police will have such a co-ordinator as well. That illustrates the fact that the Government and the police recognise that domestic violence is a serious crime that needs to be policed rigorously and effectively, but our commitment to tackling domestic violence does not stop there. To ensure that we capitalise on the improved policing policy, the Crown Prosecution Service has also created a domestic violence training pack for all its prosecutors. It, too, has set a target of having all prosecutors trained on the programme by 2008 and every CPS area, including Thames Valley, now has a domestic violence co-ordinator.

Last year, to strengthen the role of the criminal justice system further, the Government announced the development of 25 specialist domestic violence court systems, which will be in place by April 2006—so they are obviously just in place. There will now be at least one specialist domestic violence court area in every region of the country—obviously, including the Thames valley. In this context, specialist courts are not just about the practice of courts and their procedures; neither are they about tangible changes being made to existing courthouses: it is an approach that situates the court system and the criminal justice system as part of a community-wide response to domestic violence. Clearly, such arrangements may cover parts of the Thames Valley area.

I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidenhead on initiating the debate. I am very happy to meet her to discuss what is clearly an issue of importance not just in the Thames Valley area but in the whole country and something about which we, as a country, need to do more. This was a terrible case; we must learn the lessons from it. Thames Valley police, as well as all other forces, have reviewed their procedures, and we must all hope that, in so far as possible, such tragedies are avoided in the future. I thank the right hon. Lady again for raising the issue; I am sure that we all need to do something more about it.

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at twenty-nine minutes to Eight o'clock.

Deferred Division

CONVENTIONS (JOINT COMMITTEE)

That the Lords Message [25 April] relating to Conventions be now considered.

That this House concurs with the Lords in the said Resolution;

That, accepting the primacy of the House of Commons, a Select Committee of 11 Members be appointed to join with a Committee appointed by the House of Lords as the Joint Committee on Conventions, to consider the practicality of codifying the key conventions on the relationship between the two Houses of Parliament which affect the consideration of legislation, in particular.

(A) The Salisbury-Addison convention that the Lords does not vote against measures included in the governing party's Manifesto;

(B) conventions on secondary legislation;

(C) the convention that Government business in the Lords should be considered in reasonable time;

(D) conventions governing the exchange of amendments to legislation between the two Houses; and that the Committee should report by Friday 21 July 2006;

That the Committee should have power—

(i) To send for persons, papers and records;

(ii) to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House;

(iii) to report from time to time;

(iv) to appoint specialist advisers;

(v) to adjourn from place to place within the United Kingdom; and

That Mr. Russell Brown, Mr. Wayne David, Mr. George Howarth, Simon Hughes, Sarah McCarthy-Fry, Andrew Miller, Sir Malcolm Rifkind, Mr. John Spellar, Ms Gisela Stuart, Mr. Andrew Tyrie and Sir Nicholas Winterton be Members of the Committee.

The House divided: Ayes 416, Noes 20.

Thursday 18 May 2006

The House met at half-past Ten o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEATH OF A MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to report to the House the death of the right hon. Eric Forth, Member for Bromley and Chislehurst. I am sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House will join me in mourning the loss of a colleague and in extending our sympathy to the right hon. Member's family and friends.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

England Rural Development Programme

1. Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): What analysis his Department has undertaken in advance of setting out its preferred options for the England rural development programme 2007 to 2013; and if he will make a statement. [71660]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Barry Gardiner): The current consultation on the priorities for the next rural development programme for England has been informed by our extensive analysis of economic, environmental and social issues facing rural areas. We will use it to enhance the environment and countryside, to make agriculture and forestry more sustainable and to promote opportunities in rural areas for those who are disadvantaged. We will continue to develop the evidence base and work closely with all our partnership organisations to ensure that the new programme delivers on our priorities for the next seven years.

Mr. Drew: I add my condolences.

I welcome my hon. Friend to his new post. He has already shown a good grasp of biodiversity. Is it not a shame that the Government are apparently examining only one measure of animal welfare, although if they were to follow the lead of our territorial Governments and Assemblies in Scotland and Wales, they would be looking at more measures? Is it not wrong that that is one aspect of the cuts in rural funding, although several of us made it clear that that was not the right way to go? I hope that my hon. Friend will give some good news—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Barry Gardiner: The Government recognise the importance of good animal health and welfare standards in the farming industry, but we are confident that farmers in England already achieve animal welfare standards that are in excess of the minimum legal requirements. That is a matter of good stock management and it makes sound business sense. We try to target scarce resources not towards existing good practice in that area, but to incentivise new ways of making agriculture more competitive and sustainable. We can use other measures in axis 1 to improve the skills base of people in the industry to ensure that we direct resources towards animal welfare.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): May I express my deep condolences to Carroll and sympathy to Eric's family and friends, wherever they are?

The Minister's Department shares membership with the Department of Trade and Industry and Post Office Ltd. of a tripartite committee on the development of the rural post office network. Does he agree that many other Government Departments are sadly undermining the future of the post office network by, for example, removing the TV licence, taking benefit payments out of the network and threatening the future of the Post Office card account, and are thus driving people on to the roads to go out of their villages and into towns to access essential services? I know that £450 million is being—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must cut down the questions. That question was far too long.

Barry Gardiner: The Government recognise that access to essential services through the post office network is critical for the countryside and people living in rural areas. However, we must recognise that the network is not being used as it once was by people in both urban and rural areas. Customers have voted with their feet. The loss to the network started long before 1993, the changes regarding the Post Office card account and the direct payment of benefits. If the Government are to act responsibly, they must ensure that they get the maximum benefit to people through services. However, they must examine new ways of delivering those services, such as through the internet, as the customer demands that we should. We need to meet customers' needs in the way in which they want us to.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his new role. I think that the closest that he has come to farming in the past is Farm road, which is a small lane in his constituency.

Has the Minister read pages 33 and 34 of the consultation, which propose that animal welfare payments are excluded from the new programme? Has his Department failed to understand that that money could be used to improve animal welfare, as well as to reduce the advantage of cheap imports from foreign countries that put a low value on animal welfare? Given that the programme in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland will support animal welfare, why is England being left behind?

Barry Gardiner: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his welcome to my new duties. If one were to consider a Minister having a farming constituency a sufficient condition of all going well in the countryside, rural communities would never have suffered the outbreaks of BSE and of salmonella in poultry that they experienced under Tory grandees. Let Ministers be judged on their actions, not on their provenance.

The hon. Gentleman failed to listen to my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). Far from excluding animal welfare from the rural development programme, we have specifically stated ways in which we can deliver on that agenda through training and access to skills under axis 1 and axis 3. After the Curry commission, the Government's clear focus is, rightly, on establishing environmental standards and stewardship at the heart of our efforts. That is the future of farming and farmers in this country.

Greenhouse Gases

2. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If he will set targets for a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions from aircraft and ships which are not included in Government figures on greenhouse gas emissions. [71661]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Ian Pearson): Emissions from international aviation and maritime transport were not included in the 1997 Kyoto protocol. We are working at international level to limit or reduce those emissions. As part of that work, we want the aviation sector to be included in the European Union emissions trading scheme.

Mr. Allen: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the recent work done at Manchester university that shows that if international pollution from sources such as aviation and shipping is included in the calculation of emissions, the UK has made no reduction in carbon dioxide emissions since 1990. Will he commit to working with his European partners to establish an EU framework to reduce the emissions involved in international pollution? Does not that problem underline the fact that although all of us must do what we can as individuals to combat environmental pollution, ultimately the answer lies at international level and in global agreements?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend is entirely right. I am aware of the research conducted by Manchester university. The issue that he describes is the reason why the Government are so committed to taking action internationally. As I said, we want the aviation sector to be included in the EU ETS, and one of the achievements of the UK presidency last year was to get the Environment Council in December to agree that the Commission would make proposals this year on aviation's inclusion in the scheme. We shall continue to press the Commission on that.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I have met the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Barry Gardiner), with a constituency company in the aerospace industry that is having problems with emissions. The company is Senior Aerospace and it is critical to the aerospace industry. Will the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment do me the courtesy of meeting me and my constituency company to discuss its future?

Ian Pearson: I shall be happy to meet the hon. Gentleman. The aerospace industry is critical to the north-west and the region that he represents. I recently had the opportunity to go round the Airbus factory in Toulouse, where I saw the new A380, which is being flown into Heathrow today. It is an enormous piece of engineering and a tribute to British expertise—for example, the Rolls-Royce engines are far more environmentally friendly than their predecessors. It is something of which we can be proud.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that the aviation industry is widely reported to support the establishment of an emissions trading scheme within the EU, but he will also know that there is no prospect of replacing aviation kerosene with a low or zero-carbon fuel. There is therefore a danger that, under an emissions trading scheme, the aviation industry will simply purchase credits from other sectors that have succeeded in making cuts, without doing so itself. Does he agree that much greater pressure must be brought to bear to boost scientific research into aviation fuels and engines, so that the industry itself can contribute to significant cuts in the future?

Ian Pearson: I know that my hon. Friend takes a deep interest in these matters. He is right to say that more research into improving fuel technologies is needed. That work is happening now, but that does not detract from the fact that we want aviation to be included in the EU ETS and, as a Government, we shall continue to press for that.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): May I first express my condolences to the family of Eric Forth? It is shocking that someone who made such a lively and vigorous contribution to the proceedings of the House should be struck down in such a way. I will miss sparring with him, not least on the issues that we are discussing today, such as climate change.

Does the Minister agree that an 8 per cent. fall in revenue in four years against a 35 per cent. rise in the number of air passengers makes a mockery of air passenger duty, and that it should be restructured so as to be based on emissions to encourage full flights? Will the hon. Gentleman undertake to raise this matter with his colleagues, including the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Does he agree that the issue is symptomatic of a failure properly to examine the potential environmental impact of green taxes across the board? Will he urge his Treasury colleagues to bring forward a comprehensive review of environmental tax incentives?

Ian Pearson: No, I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman on green taxation policy. As a Government, we have made major improvements. We shall continue to review matters such as air passenger duty. We should not underestimate the achievements that have been made. The UK is one of the few countries that is on target to meet its Kyoto commitments. I am proud of that fact. The climate change programme that we published in March sets out a range of actions. We have set a direction of travel for the UK that is leading the world. We need now to continue to push internationally to get other countries to follow the same policies as those of the United Kingdom. That action is needed urgently if we are to tackle the greatest problem facing the planet in the long term.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): The whole House has been shocked by the news about Eric Forth. I join with those who have sent condolences to his wife and family. He was a formidable parliamentarian and he will be greatly missed.

May I further illustrate the scale of the challenge that is posed by aviation emissions? Everyone knows that the problem at present is quite small, but statistics show that emissions are growing by about 12 per cent. a year. Assuming that we meet the 60 per cent. total emission reduction target by 2050, and using figures based on public transport forecasts and those of the Treasury, aviation emissions are on track to represent about 60 per cent. of the UK total by 2050. That calculation is supported by the Environment Audit Committee and by the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution.

So far, the Government's position, first, has been to leave aviation emissions out of the calculations, which is clearly untenable. Secondly, they hope—we have heard about this again this morning—that aviation can be included in the troubled EU emissions trading scheme. If that proves impossible, is there a plan B?

Ian Pearson: I add my condolences to those expressed by the hon. Gentleman with respect to Eric Forth, who was widely respected in the House. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will want to say something about that shortly.

The hon. Gentleman is right that we want to see aviation fuel as part of an emissions trading scheme. We need to take action on aviation fuel. That is why, through the United Nations framework convention on climate change and the International Civil Aviation Organisation, the United Kingdom is pushing to ensure that international action is taken. International industries need international solutions. That is why it is so important that we take this action. It is right that aviation fuel represents about only 5 per cent. of UK emissions, but the use of it is planned to increase. That is why we need to take urgent action. We need to commit ourselves internationally.

Single Farm Payments

3. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What representations he has made to the EU on extending the period of time to make single farm payments to farmers. [71662]

4. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): How many officials have been moved from his Department as a consequence of problems with single farm payments. [71663]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (David Miliband): Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will allow me to associate the entire ministerial team at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs with the shock and dismay expressed by Members on both sides of the House about the untimely death of Eric Forth. He was utterly committed not just to his constituency, but to the House of Commons, and he was an important example to us all.

Officials effectively applied for an extension for the payment deadline to the European Commission in April, but I am relieved to report to the House that, according to the latest figures, 87 per cent. of payments have now been disbursed to 76 per cent. of claimants. Four DEFRA Officials, including chief executive Mark Addison, have been temporarily loaned to the Rural Payments Agency for different periods to strengthen the agency's capacity to deal with the current problems associated with the single payment scheme.

Tony Baldry: We welcome the Secretary of State to his new post, but I hope that he appreciates that farmers began to feel unloved when we had three farm Ministers in five days. Why were part-payments not made to farmers in January and will they receive any compensation for the interest on their debts and borrowings? There is another mystery to resolve. In April, officials wrote to the European Commission asking for an extension but, at the same time, the previous Secretary of State told the House that all was well. Those two facts are irreconcilable, but perhaps he can try to reconcile them.

David Miliband: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his welcome. There was no technical reason why partial payments could not have been made in January, but all the advice that Ministers received was that the scheme was on track. When it became clear that it was off track we had to take emergency measures. I hope that farmers in his constituency have received partial payments, as 31,000 have been made. By the middle of April, it was appropriate to approach the European Commission—officials have done so, and we await a reply. Our priority is obviously to make sure that the payments are made. There are about 3,700 large claims that are still waiting to be made—the figure is down from the 5,000 a week ago—and a remaining 20 per cent. payment must be made to the 31,000 farmers who have received partial payments. Finally, there is the question of small claims of less than €1,000. More than half of the claimants in that category—about 40,000 or so—have received payment, but we want to make sure that the rest of them do so.

Mr. Robathan: As a farmer, I have dealings with the Rural Payments Agency and I can tell the new ministerial team that it is hopelessly bureaucratic, over-staffed and astonishingly inefficient. The debacle over the single farm payment has caused hardship for many farmers across the country, and they are in serious difficulty. The chief executive has been moved, my neighbour and friend, Lord Bach, has been sacked and, bizarrely, the previous Secretary of State was promoted. However, the whole organisation needs a shake-up. Will the new ministerial team look at the way in which the RPA functions and shake it up from top to bottom? As Ministers are new to the job, they have a good opportunity to make the agency work for the benefit of agriculture, the environment and the farming industry.

David Miliband: Given that our priority is to get the money out to farming communities, the last thing that we should do is give the organisation a great big shake. The priority is to get the money out properly, but it is right, as I said in my statement last week, to learn the lessons of the difficulties of 2005. I make no attempt to hide the difficulties that continue to challenge us in 2006, but I am determined, with the new chief executive, to ensure that we establish a dependable organisation with which farmers such as the hon. Gentleman can deal efficiently.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, welcome the Secretary of State to his new post, and I wish him good fortune with his wide-ranging responsibilities.

Indebtedness in British agriculture now stands at £9.3 billion, which is an increase of £8 million on the figure 12 months ago. Increased borrowing involves increased costs in interest rates and arrangement fees, which the industry can ill afford. English farmers are a special case, because almost every other European nation managed to make the payment at the beginning of the payment window. Will the Secretary of State make arrangements to meet the EU Commissioner soon to work out a special compensation scheme so that English farmers do not bear the cost of the Government's crass incompetence?

David Miliband: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that I shall be attending my first Agriculture Council on Monday—a treat reserved for the lucky few. I gather that it is a process designed to convince those of us of strong pro-European credentials that we could not be more right, and that the European Union is the most perfect organisation to deal with. I will meet the Commissioner on Monday. It is important that we give out a message from our Department that we are proud of the work of British farmers, that the British food that they produce is top quality, and that we are determined to work with them to support the environment in which they live and to ensure not only that the farming payments are made, but that the diversification that they have led over the past few years continues. For me, farmers are at the front line of the fight against climate change and we must ensure that they are supported in their activities.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): In welcoming the Secretary of State to his new and ever-challenging post, may I remind him that the permanent secretary of his Department on Monday said about what happened in February with the Rural Payments Agency that when they came to press the button to pay the cheques, there was "a spurt" and then the system had "gummed up." Has the new Secretary of State asked why the system gummed up? If he has had an answer, can he share it with the House?

David Miliband: "Gummed up" is one of the more technical terms that I shall have to get used to in my briefings. The post-mortem on the difficulties will take place. The Hunter review is going through. We are determined to learn the lessons, but in the two meetings that I have had so far, my priority has been to make sure, first, that the partial payments go out to provide relief, and secondly, that we have a clear sense of priorities to tackle the outstanding claims. The fact that those 5,000 complex cases that I reported last week are now down to about 3,700 is a sign of progress made by the staff of the agency.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): On a more general philosophical point of good and efficient governance, why is no civil servant, with the rarest of rare exceptions, ever dismissed for incompetence?

David Miliband: The senior civil servant at the Rural Payments Agency did lose his job in this case.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Has he gone?

David Miliband: He certainly has gone. His replacement has done an excellent job and I look forward to putting the RPA on to a settled basis.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for kind remarks about Eric Forth. Those of us who served with him in government understood his ability in that context and as a parliamentarian.

I welcome the Secretary of State to his new responsibility. He takes over at a time when the distrust of the Government by farmers is probably at its lowest ebb since 1947—[Interruption.] I am delighted that hon. Members take such pleasure in the distrust of the Government by farmers. The partial payments are welcome, though long overdue, and the Minister has just said that the 5,000-odd complex cases have been reduced to 3,700, which I am glad to hear, but those—they are all large farmers—have received nothing. Also, as the Secretary of State will know, by last Monday farmers were required to claim this year's for payment on their entitlements, even though the vast majority have not had their entitlements validated, so their difficulty in filling in an accurate form is obvious. As he has asked for the extension to the payment window, why does he not also ask for an extension to this year's claim date, as Poland has already done, so that those claims can be based on validated entitlements, otherwise he will face thousands of individual disputes next year about why claims have been incorrectly submitted, based on false evidence and false information from the Rural Payments Agency?

David Miliband: I am sorry that there is confusion about the matter. Working with the National Farmers Union, among others, the deadline for submitting forms for 2006 has been extended to 31 May.

Mr. Paice: Not long enough.

David Miliband: The National Farmers Union—the hon. Gentleman can visit its website—said that that was an excellent development and is working with us to ensure that every farmer gets their form in. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman can come back for a second question, and I will give him a good answer.

Climate Change

5. Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Whether he expects the UK to meet the deadline of 2 June to respond to the consultation by working group 1 of the fourth assessment report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. [71665]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (David Miliband): Yes.

Martin Horwood: I share in the expressions of sympathy for the family of Eric Forth. Those of us who would argue with his politics on many occasions could never argue with the wit and intellect with which he put them forward.

I am pleased by the Minister's response and glad that he is going to meet that deadline. Given that we would probably be in sympathy with much of the content of our submission on the science of climate change, what pressure is he putting on the American Government to ensure that their submission will finally accept the consensus of scientific opinion on climate change?

David Miliband: I think that people way above my pay grade are putting the right sort of discussions on the table with the American Government. Our responsibility is to ensure that our contribution to the IPCC report, which gains its authority from the fact that it represents an international consensus on climate change, continues to establish an intellectual basis for the changes that we need to make. I have not read the report but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that all the indications that I have had from the IPCC suggest that the degree of alarm that we should feel about climate change is well justified.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is correct. The alarm that the report will cause should galvanise us all in this country, but without international action much of what we can achieve could be minimal. Only this week, I read that China is building another 48 airports. Taking that into account, together with the Americans not coming on board, it is clear that whatever we do will have minimal effect. Will he ensure that what comes out of this is a genuine commitment on the part of those other countries to make their contribution to tackling climate change? Otherwise, we will all be struggling with this concept, and the poorest in the world will feel the consequences first.

David Miliband: I know that my hon. Friend takes an interest in these issues. I hope that he will agree that a year or 18 months ago, people around the world, notably in the United States, were still debating whether climate change is happening. As a result, due in significant part to the leadership of the Government in the G8 and the EU presidency, we are moving from a debate about whether climate change is happening to what we do about it. I include the United States in that—notably many of the states of the US, which are keen to participate in international action. That is significant. I can confirm to my hon. Friend that it is clear from all the reading that I have done so far that there is an effort right across Government—not only from the top, with the Prime Minister and the new Foreign Secretary, but from my Department—to ensure that the international agenda remains absolutely central to what we do while not neglecting the fact that our domestic performance and international clout are linked.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I welcome the new Secretary of State to his post and wish him well. He joins the Department at an exciting and challenging time. I very much hope that we will be able to forge a constructive relationship. He will know that I think it important that we work together as much as possible in facing the threat of climate change.

May I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that his first task should be to restore confidence in his own Department? There have been too many missed targets and too many arguments lost with other Departments. When it should be at the centre of our efforts to tackle climate change, DEFRA has found itself marginalised on the energy review and on the environmental impact of house building, undermined on the impacts of aviation and undermined by the Department of Trade and Industry in European discussions on carbon reduction. He says that there are people above his pay grade. Let him not be daunted by those people. Let him speak up for the things that DEFRA is charged with looking after and let him restore confidence in the Department. How is he going to set about doing that?

David Miliband: I am happy to respond to the challenge. I will speak up as necessary, both inside and outside Government. If we can forge a consensus and if the new model Conservative party wants to see the light, I welcome it to the consensus table.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): We are there.

David Miliband: The hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that they are there. Coming from a party that has been outside the mainstream of politics for the past 15 years, I think that he has got a bit to learn.

Biomass

6. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If he will make a statement on Government policy on the use of biomass to meet the UK's energy needs. [71666]

8. Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to encourage the development of energy from biomass. [71668]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Ian Pearson): The Government acknowledge that biomass is an important contributor to renewable energy, with potential applications in heat, electricity, combined heat and power and transport. The Government's response to the biomass taskforce report was published on 27 April and sets out a range of actions to help realise optimum use of biomass as a resource.

Mr. Bone: I understand that a biomass plant needs between 40 and 50 large lorries to go in and out of the site each day with the raw material required to produce the biomass energy. Has the Minister made an assessment of the advantage to the environment of biomass as against the clear disadvantage of those lorry movements?

Ian Pearson: As the hon. Gentleman would expect, the Government regularly look at these issues, making cost-benefit analyses and evaluating different policy proposals. Biomass can play an important part in reaching our renewables targets. The biomass taskforce estimates it has the potential to supply 6 per cent. of our electricity needs by 2020. Only last week, I went round Talbott's in Stafford, which is a world leader in producing biomass power plant. A lot can be done with these resources, and it is important to look at the whole environmental picture, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says.

Sir Peter Soulsby: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, and I welcome the Government's positive response to Sir Ben Gill's biomass taskforce. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Prime Minister's recent speech apparently embracing a new generation of nuclear power stations reinforces the vital need for DEFRA to address the widespread ignorance, both inside and outside the Government, of the potential of biomass to offer significant energy and carbon savings? Does he also acknowledge the need for his Department to demonstrate to colleagues in Government that biomass and other renewable sources, taken together, can provide a viable alternative to new nuclear power stations?

Ian Pearson: First, let us be clear about the Prime Minister's comments. He was referring to the fact that, if present policy remains unchanged, we shall become heavily dependent on imported gas, moving from being 80 to 90 per cent. self-reliant to being 80 to 90 per cent. dependent. He said that that meant that the replacement of nuclear power stations, along with a big push towards renewables and a step change in energy efficiency, engaging businesses and consumers, were all back on the agenda. The energy review is looking at all those issues and it will come up with a balanced result. Biomass can be part of the overall picture. Sir Ben Gill's report says that it has the potential to provide 6 per cent. of our energy needs by 2020, and that is very much to be welcomed. The figure is only 1 per cent. at the moment, so we have a long way to go if we are to achieve that, but important developments are taking place with biomass and biofuels that give us optimism for the future.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): May I, on behalf of my colleagues, associate myself with the sympathies that have been expressed on the passing of Eric Forth? He was a colourful character in more ways than one, and he will be sadly missed.

A few weeks ago, the energy and environment fund was established in Northern Ireland. Does the Minister think that it would be a good idea if a percentage of that fund, and of similar funds that might be established across the United Kingdom, were used to support and promote the development of biomass energy?

Ian Pearson: I know that the situation is different in Northern Ireland and that a lot of work has been done there on the production of short rotation coppice willow, for example. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that John Gilliland, a valued member of the Sustainable Development Commission, has pioneered this work on his farm in Derry. The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that funding is available in Northern Ireland, as it is in England, Wales and Scotland, and it is right that the Government should give this new technology every encouragement. I am sure that, as biomass becomes more established, the market for it will grow and welcome improvements in cost-efficiency will help the renewable energy market to prosper.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): May I also associate myself with the remarks of other hon. Members about Eric Forth?

My hon. Friend the Minister makes all the right noises about biomass, but the complete opposite is happening on the ground. Hon. Members might have seen the hysterical scare stories in yesterday's newspapers about the amount of carbon dioxide being released from Drax power station. Up to April, however, the power station was co-firing coal with biomass up to a rate of 25 per cent. However, the regulations that were imposed from 1 April this year have reduced the biomass element of the co-firing to 15 per cent. Will my hon. Friend look again at those regulations, to see whether we can increase the levels permitted in co-firing, or move to complete biomass firing?

Ian Pearson: The Government have looked at co-firing recently, but as part of my new brief I am more than happy to look at it again. I pay tribute to the hard work of my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who I know is widely respected on both sides of the House for the work that he has done in this area.

The important point to make about biomass is that energy crops have enormous benefits not just for biomass projects for co-firing power stations and for biomass combined heat and power plant, but in terms of biofuels. A lot more can be done in that area. The renewable transport fuel obligation will be an important driver in encouraging the growth of bioenergy crops.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister is aware of the level of biomass in the residual waste stream in industry and in the domestic sector. In addition to investigating rules on the level of biomass that may be engaged in co-firing, what investigation has he undertaken into the potential for existing power stations to co-fire biomass-rich material from the residual waste stream after it has been processed as a suitable fuel?

Ian Pearson: I take my hon. Friend's point. I understand that that was considered as part of the biomass taskforce report, but I will certainly look into his point; perhaps I may write to him on it.

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that another by-product of biomass is the opportunity for high-energy-consuming industries to give themselves a longer-term future by considering biomass as an alternative energy source? That is the case in my constituency of Glenrothes, where Tullis Russell is trying to process such ideas. One of the main difficulties is gaining access to the national grid, which takes an extraordinary amount of time compared with the time it takes to get the initiative developed. Therefore, a gap exists, which is unhealthy and discouraging to the initiative taking place. Will he consider those points in due course?

Ian Pearson: There are a number of points about grid access and access charges that are important and which we are looking at as part of our future policy on biomass, but my hon. Friend is right to point out that there is a growing industry here and growing interest in biomass. There is also an interest from growers in growing energy crops, whether it be Miscanthus or short rotation coppice willow. We need to ensure that we can help to drive the market in those renewable energy projects. The introduction of new building regulations from April this year, as well as new procedures and tougher standards as part of that, can be helpful in getting more companies and public sector organisations to consider biomass energy part of their energy solutions.

Recycling

7. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What proportion of the waste collected under local authority recycling schemes was exported in the latest period for which figures are available. [71667]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): As a former Deputy Leader of the House, I associate myself with the warm tributes paid to Eric Forth. The exchanges at business questions between Eric and my late friend and colleague Robin Cook were among the most memorable since I have been a Member of the House.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) that the figures she seeks are not available centrally. However, all exported waste must be of high quality and must be recycled at its destination. Those rules are strictly enforced by the Environment Agency.

Ann Winterton: Putting aside the issue of plastic waste and what the United Kingdom will do if the high demands made by China and the high prices paid change, as well as whether we will be able to cope with that, is the Minister not aware that the Environment Agency has reported that about half the 8 million tonnes of green-bin waste collected each year in the UK has been exported and that 500 tonnes have been shipped unsorted to Indonesia, which will be dumped in that country because it does not have adequate recycling facilities of its own? What will he do about that scandal and to reassure those of us in the UK who are keen on recycling?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Lady is absolutely right about the challenge posed by plastics. As a country, however, we are increasing our domestic capacity to recycle plastics. Two big companies, Coca-Cola and Marks & Spencer, have recently introduced recycled plastics into their bottles and other packaging. On the export of waste, her figures are not quite right. The 50 per cent. figure that she quotes is an Environment Agency estimate relating to paper. She is right that there is a big foreign market for paper and plastics, which should not be derided—it is good that there are markets for recycled products, because it is better to use those than virgin products. The Environment Agency takes its responsibilities seriously and, as she probably also knows, is bringing several prosecutions on the issue to which she refers.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I also pay tribute to the former right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who was a master of this House of Commons. If anyone deserves to be remembered as a true parliamentarian, it is Eric.

We still recycle far less than most other major European countries. In every year since Labour took office, the amount of waste produced by the nation has continued to grow. We have had endless short-term waste initiatives, but we still seem not to be making the substantial progress that we need. The Minister has recently taken over responsibility for this issue. Can he tell us something that we have not heard before about it?

Mr. Bradshaw: I can tell the hon. Gentleman something that I have said on several occasions that he obviously has not heard: recycling has trebled since this Government took over from the previous Government. The previous Government's figures were appalling. Our new waste strategy envisages a further doubling of recycling to 50 per cent. by 2020. That is a far better record than the Conservatives ever had.

Grocery Market

9. Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): What discussions he has had with the Department of Trade and Industry regarding the Competition Commission investigation of the grocery market. [71669]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): There have been several discussions among Ministers and with the Office of Fair Trading about this matter. Now that an inquiry has been announced, we will write to the Competition Commission to suggest that its investigation should include the impact of supermarket buyer power on the long-term viability of suppliers and producers in the UK. In the meantime, my right hon. Friend the new Secretary of State has written today to the supermarkets inviting them for talks on how we can improve further the sustainability of the food chain.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer and to hear that his Department is taking action to draw to the attention of the OFT and Competition Commission the many complaints that farmers have made about the way in which supermarkets deal with their suppliers. Will he also make clear in his representations the importance that Members of the House attach to the role of small shops in rural communities and in larger centres such as Inverness, where the increasing dominance of supermarkets is having such a dramatic impact? If the Competition Commission can take action to protect and enhance the position of consumers, farmers and small shops, it will do a great deal to boost the sustainability of rural communities.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's welcome for my remarks. He is right that the Competition Commission is free to consider the impact on small shops, and I think that it has already indicated that the concern that he expressed will form part of its inquiry.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that Tesco plans to build a second massive store in my constituency, which will destroy a local shopping area and create massive traffic congestion? When I expressed doubts about it, I was attacked by Tesco's propaganda machine. Is not the reality that Tesco is changing from a giant into a monster?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am sure that my hon. Friend is a big enough man to take on the Tesco propaganda machine. It would be improper for me to comment on an individual planning application, although I remind him that the Government have changed the planning guidance to make it more difficult to build out-of-town supermarkets of the type to which he refers. I was also pleased this week to see the major supermarkets, including Tesco, almost falling over each other in an attempt to prove their green credentials—not unrelated, I think, to the Government's recent publication of our new sustainable food and farming policy.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I associate myself fully with the remarks about the late Eric Forth. He was truly formidable in the House and a great parliamentarian. I am sure that he will be missed throughout the House.

I also associate myself with those who have welcomed the forthcoming report. Will the OFT's remit include thinking again about whether supermarkets should benefit from advantageous commercial rates? Currently they are favoured in comparison with those in the smaller sector in terms of the rate that they pay per sq ft.

Mr. Bradshaw: Those are issues for the Competition Commission. As I told the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), we in the Department have written to the commission expressing some of our concerns, but any Member or organisation is free to write to it suggesting matters that it should look into. It is important for the competition authorities to be independent and not part of Government.

Single Farm Payments

10. Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): What proportion of single farm payments to farmers in Essex have been paid. [71670]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (David Miliband): As I explained earlier, the single payment scheme is being administered nationally, so information is not collected on claims from farmers in particular counties.

For the benefit of the hon. Gentleman, who was not present earlier, I can announce that by 15 May some 76 per cent. of the 120,000 claimants to the 2005 scheme had received just over 86 per cent. of the estimated available funds.

Mr. Newmark: I join others in paying tribute to Eric Forth. As a relatively new Member, I always appreciated Eric's experience, advice and guidance.

My constituent Mr. Christopher Hill is one of 5,000 farmers who have been notified by the Rural Payments Agency that they will not receive an 80 per cent. payment to alleviate short-term cashflow problems. Why have some farmers received their part-payments while others have not?

David Miliband: I do not want to be too hard on the hon. Gentleman, but I am sure that one piece of advice that Eric Forth would have given him would be to read written statements and attend the whole of Question Time. If he had read my written statement last week, he would have seen the explanation: there were 5,000 particularly complex cases in which partial payment was not possible, but we had given priority to ensuring that those cases were dealt with properly. If he had been here earlier, he would have heard me say that the number of cases is no longer 5,000, but is now 3,700. I am not sure whether Mr. Hill is among the remaining 1,300, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that sorting out those farmers' problems is the RPA's top priority.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): The Minister said earlier that he wished to draw conclusions from our recent problems.

David Miliband: Lessons.

Mr. Curry: Would an early lesson be that introducing the most complex scheme on offer in the shortest time on offer against a background of tens of thousands of new claimants, a reorganised administration and problems in the IT system represents a decision in search of a disaster? Will the Minister therefore undertake to establish a rule in his Department, now that he is in charge of it, ensuring that he will introduce no new scheme until he is absolutely certain that he is capable of delivering it and that the systems for that purpose have been tested and tried?

David Miliband: Since I have been a Minister I have had the good fortune to follow the right hon. Gentleman into a number of Departments. I believe that he has been a Minister in most of the Departments in which I have served, and he was a distinguished Minister in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The lesson that he has drawn is one that we will consider, among others that are put to us, during our reflections on the difficulties of 2005.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

11. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): What steps he is taking to reduce UK food miles and their contribution to carbon dioxide emissions in the UK. [71671]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Ian Pearson): The food industry sustainability strategy, published last month, challenges the food industry to reduce the external costs associated with its domestic food transportation, including those arising from carbon emissions, by about 20 per cent. by 2012. An industry-led champions group, including other stakeholders, is being established to implement it.

David Tredinnick: That was a disappointing reply. Is it not a fact that the number of UK food miles has increased owing to the inexcusable chaos of single farm payments in the Department? Leicestershire farmers are struggling, at the mercy of their bank managers and unable even to pay for fertilisers to make their crops grow. Has that not increased the UK food miles problem? What is the Minister doing to help farmers to distribute UK food through farmers' markets such as the one in Hinckley and the new one that is being set up in Market Bosworth? What is the Department doing to help our farmers?

Ian Pearson: It is stretching a point to breaking-point to say that the single farm payment is responsible for the increase in food miles. We are trying to work closely with the industry to improve resource efficiency, which will enable us to address the food miles problem. Clearly, one issue is people driving to supermarkets and shops to buy their goods, but we must also consider the carbon dioxide emissions produced by HGVs. The more that we can improve efficiency, the better will be the impact on the environment. That is why the champions group has been set up, which we hope will help us to achieve our target of a 20 per cent. reduction by 2012.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): May I, too, take this opportunity to offer my condolences to the friends and family of Eric Forth? Although I am one of the newer Members, I did not have to be here long to appreciate his formidable skill as a parliamentarian.

Does the Minister agree that, just as consumers nowadays choose, if they wish, the food that they buy according to information on the label such as fat content and calorie content, there may well be a case for also including food miles, so that they can make an even more informed choice?

Ian Pearson: I am not sure whether including food miles on the label would be that beneficial. When one reads on a label that the produce's country of origin is Kenya, and that produce is beans, one can draw one's own conclusions. I am very attracted to the idea that we should buy more local produce, and farmers' markets, to which reference has been made, are an extremely worthwhile initiative in that regard. The more that we can buy local and source local, the better will be the impact on the environment.

Single Farm Payments

12. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet representatives of the National Farmers Union to discuss single farm payments. [71672]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (David Miliband): During a visit to Hampshire last week, I met the president of the NFU and we discussed the single farm payment scheme, among other matters. The Minister with responsibility for sustainable farming and food, my noble Friend Lord Rooker—who will be an outstanding DEFRA Minister and a strong voice for the Department in the other place, as its Deputy Leader—will meet NFU representatives for the second time, on 24 May, as part of a regular series of meetings to discuss the single farm payment scheme.

Mr. Bellingham: I, too, would like to associate myself with the remarks about Eric Forth.

Is the Secretary of State aware that some of the returned addressed envelopes sent out by the RPA to various farmers had the wrong post office box number and postcode on them? Is he also aware that a batch of special delivery envelopes were delivered not to the RPA, but to a company called Intelligent Security Solutions? Come to think of it, it might have made a better job of sorting out the contents. Is he further aware that a rumour is going around that some of the RPA staff at Newcastle—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There have been about three supplementary questions already.

David Miliband: I think that the hon. Gentleman was just getting on to coals to Newcastle, Mr. Speaker, so I am sorry that I missed that. I do not know about the case that the hon. Gentleman mentions, but I will be very happy to look into it if he passes me the details.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I declare an interest in the single farm payment. The Secretary of State has given us updated figures today on the welcome progress that the RPA is finally achieving in making payments and part-payments. He has talked about those who have received nothing so far, but he has not mentioned the issue that the NFU is talking to me about: those who have received excess payments. I was told as recently as Tuesday of a farmer who was expecting to receive a cheque for £35,000, but who instead received one for £2.1 million. One can imagine his surprise and pleasure on opening his mail that day. Given this shambles, will the Secretary of State please update the House on the penalty regime? I know that the deadline has been extended and that farmers are now expected to get in next year's application forms by 31 May, but will the Secretary of State please extend it further until the shambles has been sorted out?

David Miliband: At the meeting that I had yesterday, it was reported that, of the 63,000 claims that have been made, 19 have been overpaid.

Recycling

13. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): What steps he is planning to take to increase recycling of waste. [71673]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): England's revised waste strategy will put forward a range of measures to build on recent improvements in recycling.

Mr. Love: Recently, and without any consultation, my local Tory authority sold off one of its two recycling centres to make a quick buck. It then received a direction from Ken Livingstone, the Mayor of London, but has continued to try to evade its environmental responsibilities. Does not that call for stronger planning powers to ensure proper recycling and respect for the environment on behalf of local people in my area?

Mr. Bradshaw: It may well do. I am sorry that my hon. Friend's local Conservative council has behaved in that way. The party pretends to be green, but it is hardly surprising that when it gets into office it is the old slash and burn Thatcherite Tory party, especially on waste and environmental issues. I will look at the matter he raises, and he is right to say that we need better strategic planning for waste infrastructure in London.

Business of the House

11.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for the coming week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Jack Straw): Before announcing the business for the week ahead, I wish to express my sorrow at the sudden death of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). The Conservative party has lost one of its stars and this House has lost a great parliamentarian. He brightened this place with his ties, his waistcoats and his love of country and western music, but above all with his personality. Eric served this Parliament with great distinction in many capacities, including on Committees, on the Speaker's Panel, in the Chamber and holding court in the Tea Room, offering advice to all comers, including myself—and very sage advice it was. But the House will recall particularly with great warmth Eric's weekly encounters with the late Robin Cook, when Robin was Leader of the House and Eric was the shadow Leader of the House. Each sharpened his wit on the other, to the great entertainment and elucidation of the rest of us. Our sympathies and prayers go to Eric's wife, Carroll, his three children, his friends and all his constituents.

The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 MAY—Consideration in Committee and remaining stages of the Armed Forces Bill.

TUESDAY 23 MAY—Progress on remaining stages of the Education and Inspections Bill.

WEDNESDAY 24 MAY—Conclusion of remaining stages of the Education and Inspections Bill.

THURSDAY 25 MAY—Motion on the Whitsun recess Adjournment.

The provisional business for the week after the Whitsun recess will include:

MONDAY 5 JUNE—Second Reading of the NHS Redress Bill [Lords].

Mrs. May: I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the business for the coming week and I echo the sentiments he expressed about my late right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). It was with deep shock and sadness that I and my right hon. and hon. Friends learned this morning of Eric's untimely death. Eric was a former shadow Leader of the House and his skirmishes each week with the late Robin Cook became legendary. Eric was above all a great parliamentarian, who loved this place and all it stood for. Never a man to pull his punches and not always beloved of the Whips or, dare I say it, Front Benchers, he was a great asset to this House. More than that, many in this House across all parties have lost not only a great colleague, but a friend. The life of this House will be the lesser for his passing. It was a mark of the man and his personality, to which the Leader of the House alluded, that the staff of the Tea Room expressed their tremendous sadness this morning, too. He had been a friend to them, not just to Members of Parliament. We have lost a great parliamentarian and we all mourn his loss. Our thoughts and prayers are with his wife, Carroll, and his family, friends and constituents.

I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware of the importance of a good conclusion to the Doha round of world trade talks, not only for this country, but for the whole developing world. May we have a debate on world trade so that we can explore the Government's position and ensure that they are putting sufficient pressure for the right conclusion of this round of trade talks on the European Trade Commissioner?

This week, it has been announced that 573 jobs will be lost at NHS Direct, in addition to the thousands of jobs being lost in hospitals across the country. May we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Heath on the future of NHS Direct?

However, that is not the only part of the NHS that is suffering financial problems. For example, the Thames Valley strategic health authority already gets 21 per cent. less funding than the average, and it has admitted that that has resulted in fewer operations and less patient care. In a presentation to the board last week, the SHA's chief executive revealed that introducing a national standard tariff across the NHS would mean that it would cost Thames Valley PCTs £70 million extra a year to provide the same services—there would be no gain in activity or in the services provided. That is just one example, so it is little wonder that people ask where all the money has gone. Therefore, may we also have a debate on the future funding of NHS trusts and the impact of the standard tariff?

That is the NHS that the Health Secretary said had had its best year ever—where on earth has she been? But that is not the only area where the Government are in denial. The head of the civil service has said of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate's work on asylum that it has "been performing particularly well", and the Prime Minster wrote to the incoming Home Secretary advising him to "continue and accelerate" the success of the Government's immigration and asylum policies.

That is the same Home Office where only 16 per cent. of officials have confidence in senior management. The director of enforcement and renewals at the immigration and nationality directorate was asked by the Home Affairs Committee how many people were in Britain illegally. He said:

"I haven't the faintest idea".

When asked how many people had been removed when all their appeal processes had been exhausted, he said:

"We don't track individual cases".

Therefore, can we have a debate on the chaos in the Government's prisons and immigration polices?

Perhaps that is why, in a recent speech, the Prime Minister revealed that he was asking the Chancellor to examine how the Treasury could be involved in ensuring the protection and security of the public. When asked if that meant that the Home Secretary would have to refer to the Chancellor before making any decisions, the Downing street spokesman said:

"No. The Home Secretary and the Chancellor will have a normal relationship".

[Mrs. May]

Presumably, that will be in contrast to the relationship between the Chancellor and the Prime Minister. Up until now, the Chancellor has been the roadblock to reform, so can we have a debate in his future role in public sector reform?

Finally, in an article in the Eastern Daily Press, the sacked former Home Secretary said of the recent reshuffle:

"I thought the point was to give a clear sense of redirection for the Government but, in the end, it hasn't worked out like that."

So the former Home Secretary says that the Government lack direction, the Health Secretary is in denial, and the Home Office is in meltdown—no wonder this is a Government in paralysis.

Mr. Straw: I shall deal in turn with the points raised by the right hon. Lady. We are doing a great deal to apply pressure where that is required, as I can confirm from my five years as Foreign Secretary. We took the lead in the EU in pushing for an end to unacceptably high and restrictive subsidies to farmers across Europe. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary used to be Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and was in the lead in negotiating the deal on the future of the common agricultural policy.

In addition, we are also pushing the US and other key partners in the Doha round, and especially the much larger states from the non-aligned movement, such as India and Brazil. Those states must also make some movement, and especially in respect of non-agricultural market access. I assure the shadow Leader of the House that there will be an opportunity to debate these matters in the regular six-monthly debate due to take place just before the European Council in mid-June. That will be a full day's debate, and I hope that she and the rest of the House will take that opportunity to discuss the matters that she has raised and other key foreign policy issues coming up before the Council, such as Iraq, Iran and the funding of Hamas.

The right hon. Lady asks about the health service. She is not correct in claiming that thousands of people will lose their jobs under changes in NHS funding. She asks where the money has gone. It has gone, first, on dramatic increases in the number of clinical staff in the health service. Overall, there has been an increase of 85,000 in the total number of nurses in the health service, including an increase of nearly 3,000 in the health area covering her constituency.

Secondly, the money has gone on ensuring that nurses and other clinical staff are better paid. The number of nurses has increased by well over a quarter since 1997 and, alongside that, the pay of nurses, in real terms after inflation, has also increased by over a quarter.

Thirdly, the money has gone on new hospital buildings, to an astonishing degree, including in my constituency and in most constituencies in the country. Fourthly, it has gone on equipment. That is why there are difficulties with the health service—there always will be—but overall, on the question of whether the health service is doing the job for which the taxpayer is paying, yes it is, which is why levels of patient satisfaction are higher and why overall, on any measure, patients are receiving better care faster, and mortality and morbidity rates all show improvement.

The right hon. Lady asks about asylum and immigration. Asylum numbers are significantly lower than when we came into office in 1997. I have every reason to remember the catastrophic record of the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who had ordered a computer system, failed to finance it properly and, at a time when numbers of asylum seekers were rising, slashed by 1,200 the number of staff in the immigration and nationality department dealing with asylum seekers. On top of that, he had declared an amnesty in which 30,000 of those people were allowed to stay in the country without further proper inquiry.

Numbers are now down, and we have passed the tipping point where the numbers leaving the country are higher than the numbers applying to stay. We have reduced the time taken to process applications from 20 months to about two months.

On the number of illegal asylum seekers, the Prime Minister reminded the House yesterday of the following:

"'There are no official estimates of the number of illegal immigrants into the United Kingdom. By its very nature, illegal immigration is difficult to measure and any estimates would be highly speculative.'"—[Official Report, 17 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 991.]

That is what the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe said in 1995. There are slightly better estimates these days, following work by Professor Salt for the research and information directorate of the Home Office, who estimated that the total number of people who are wholly illegal was between 310,000 and 500,000. Those are not asylum seekers; we know how many asylum seekers there are.

I am glad to see the shadow Home Secretary sitting next to the right hon. Lady. Whatever other promises he makes at the next election about how life will be so much better when he becomes Home Secretary—that every prisoner will become compliant, every criminal will stop committing crime and, probably much easier to achieve, that there will be no illegal immigrants because they will be scared off by the disaster of the Conservative Government—I strongly advise him not to claim that he will be able to produce an accurate estimate of the total number of illegal immigrants. That would be very unwise, as he knows. Why? Because people who are wholly illegally in this country, as in every other country, have escaped immigration control and thus, by definition, do not appear on any database. No country in the world has accurate figures for wholly illegal immigration: not the United States and not the country held up as having the greatest and most efficient system of law and order in Europe—if not the highest respect for human rights—namely, France. The French have hundreds of thousands of people who are "sans papiers." They do not know the numbers and they do not take much interest in them.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend knows that the Government have done an awful lot to recognise the tremendous contribution of our war veterans. As we approach veterans day, will he use his good offices to ensure that we reward the land army and the Bevin boys?

Mr. Straw: Yes, I will certainly use my good offices in that respect and talk immediately to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister with responsibility for veterans.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): From these Benches, may we join the tributes to Eric Forth? Business questions was his natural stage, and one on which he always excelled. Even at his most provocative, he was never less than entertaining and never less than perceptive. No one was ever in any doubt what Eric Forth thought about anything, and behind the undoubted style there was real substance. He was an ornament to the House, and he will be sorely missed.

May we have an urgent debate on nuclear power in this country? It is clearly no good waiting for the results of the energy review, because the Prime Minister has transparently decided to pre-empt the results of that review. Therefore, given the reservations that have been expressed, quite openly, by a former Minister in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the fact that the Treasury has said that the costs are likely to be eye-wateringly large, is it not time that the whole House had an opportunity to debate the matter?

If and when orders are introduced for the regionalisation of police forces—given the difficulties that have been experienced over recent days in Wales, that may not happen—can they be brought before the whole House, so that all hon. Members have the opportunity to raise the issues that are relevant to our constituencies?

It was two weeks ago, I think, that the Government was reshuffled, but still no list of ministerial responsibilities is available. Can the Leader of the House sort that out? We apparently now know what the Deputy Prime Minister is doing, but it would be nice to see which Ministers feel that they have which responsibilities, so that we can perhaps hold them to account rather better than we would otherwise.

Lastly, may we have a debate on the Human Rights Act 1998? Two weeks ago, the problem was the then Home Secretary; now it seems that everything is down to the exercise of the Human Rights Act. Frankly, the Prime Minister has been saying some very silly things about that Act over recent weeks. Given that some of us believe that the finest achievement of the Leader of the House, when he was Home Secretary, was to introduce the Human Rights Act, may we have a debate to defend the reputation of that Act and of the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Straw: On nuclear power, I cannot promise when there will be a debate on the issue, but the energy review will be published and then, in due course, there will be a debate on this country's future energy needs, including the role that nuclear power should play. Let me point out to the hon. Gentleman that people forget that nuclear energy currently plays an extraordinarily important part in energy generation. It accounts for 75—[Interruption]—terra-watt hours. I am learning.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Explain!

Mr. Straw: I am very happy to explain, but afterwards. That is 20 per cent. of total electricity generation. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) will know that, because of the decline in North sea production of gas in particular and oil, unless we take other steps to rebalance the generation of energy, including nuclear power, we will become quite unnecessarily reliant on overseas sources of energy. He will also know that the idea that renewables could possibly replace the loss of generating capacity from nuclear power is simply not the case. Even in a country such as Germany that has huge numbers of wind farms—far more than I think would ever be found acceptable here; its generation of electricity by wind is only a third of that generated by nuclear power in this country.

On the regionalisation of police forces, the orders will go through the House in the normal way. I cannot recall the procedure exactly, but I think that many of them will be taken upstairs. On the reorganisation of police forces, I know, as a former Home Secretary—everybody in the House knows it—there is simply no necessary connection between the efficiency of a police service, the degree to which the service is delivered at a local level and the overall size of the constabulary. Moreover, the current boundaries were in effect settled following the royal commission report on the police in the early 1960s. Forty years on is not too short a time to reconfigure police force boundaries to take account of the dramatic changes in our social structure in the meantime.

On a list of ministerial responsibilities, there are in the Library of the House and available on the website letters that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has sent to each departmental Minister setting out responsibilities. The detailed list of ministerial responsibilities will be published in the normal way. However, having watched oral questions every day since I became Leader of the House, I cannot say that the absence of the list has caused any difficulty whatsoever to either Ministers or Members.

On the Human Rights Act, the hon. Gentleman says that it was the finest thing that I ever did as Home Secretary. If he does not mind, I would like to say that it is one of the finest of a long list. Future historians of the Home Office may say that the finest thing that I ever did as Home Secretary was to survive four years.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): We have been here four years since you got up.

Mr. Straw: Five.

There needs to be a proper debate about the Human Rights Act. That is what we are proposing. Following 11 September, the circumstances today are very different from those anticipated at the time of the passage of the Act. There are some who say that the Human Rights Act is a problem; there are others who say its interpretation is a problem. Let us not throw the baby out with the bathwater, but look sensibly—which is what the Prime Minister wants—at how the Act is working and whether it or its interpretation should be changed.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Might we find time to debate the extent to which the tabloid virus is beginning to infect BBC television news? Has the Leader of the House noticed that newscasters increasingly no longer read news to camera, but walk around the studio like a couple of ham actors emoting? I think that it is called news with attitude. Did he notice that last night's 6 o'clock television news was cynically edited to delete the fact that the Prime Minister, in his reply to the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), quoted the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard)? That had to be reinstated—no doubt after complaints—in the 10 o'clock news bulletin. Does he agree that if the BBC cannot do better than that, it is going to have difficult, justifying its licence fee?

Mr. Straw: Editorial decisions of the BBC are for the BBC and, to make a serious point, cannot be for the House. However, I will make sure that my hon. Friend's remarks are passed on. On the issue of whether newscasters should prance around studios or sit at a desk and read the news—that is what it seems to me they are paid for, and paid too much—personally I prefer the latter to the former. On the issue of accuracy, all journalists, including those at the BBC, have a responsibility to ensure that quotations are attributed accurately.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): As Eric Forth's neighbouring MP in Bromley, may I just say a few words in addition to the very fine tributes by the Leader of the House and the shadow Leader of the House? As they have said, he will be mainly remembered as a stout defender of the role of the House of Commons and a great House of Commons man. Not everyone in the House may realise, as I did as his neighbour, that, in many ways, he was an old softie at heart. The comments made by the shadow Leader of the House about the reaction in the Tea Room reinforced that. He was a very good neighbour to me and when I faced some difficulty in the last general election, he was the first to come and help out. He was there early in the morning, no nonsense, getting on with it and saying, "I will deliver anything you want." The House may like to know that, in Bromley, he was regarded with great affection, as well as great respect, for an outstanding independence of spirit. He will be greatly missed.

Mr. Straw: Allow me to say that we all share in the hon. Gentleman's tribute. As Eric's neighbour, he has good reason to know of the affection in which Eric was held by his constituents, as well as by the House.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May I associate myself fully with all the eloquent tributes that have been paid to the late Eric Forth? He will be greatly missed.

May we have a debate, as a matter of urgency, on the decision of the local health authority in Leicester to cut £161 million from the pathway project? Although I accept everything that the Leader of the House has said about the amount of money that has gone into the health service in Leicester, both the Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Ms Hewitt) and I, in our last manifestos, specifically mentioned the amount of money to be spent on refurbishing our three hospitals. That is now going to be cut, which will mean that the hospitals cannot be refurbished. May we please have an urgent debate on this important issue?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend has put the position of the NHS in Leicester in context. There has been a significant improvement in funding in Leicestershire. The number of nurses is up 1,600 in the health authority area, there are nearly 700 more doctors, including 250 more consultants, and a lot of capital investment. I cannot promise him a debate on the Floor of the House, but there are many opportunities to raise the matter on the Adjournment, including in Westminster Hall, and I hope that he will take them. As his next-door neighbour, I am sure that the Secretary of State for Health is fully aware of the issue; indeed, I know that she is.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I associate myself with the many tributes to the late Eric Forth. He had a great love of and respect for this House and he will be missed by us all; especially those of us who sat within hearing range of his occasional sedentary comments.

May I give the Leader of the House an opportunity to distinguish himself above those who have previously held his office by addressing an issue that has yet to be satisfactorily addressed as far as the Northern Ireland Grand Committee is concerned? It appears that there are one or two Members—perhaps three—who are vetoing the idea of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee meeting in Northern Ireland. A meeting of the Grand Committee is being arranged. Will the Leader of the House use his influence to ensure that it takes place in the Province?

Mr. Straw: I will indeed use my good offices in that respect to see what can be done to ensure that there is a venue for the Grand Committee in Northern Ireland. I thank the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues for, as I understand it, attending the recent British-Irish Parliamentary Union. I accept the point that he makes and I will pursue it with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): May I also associate myself with the tributes to the late Mr. Forth?

May I ask my right hon. Friend about the case involving the death of a young boy in a secure training centre and the inability to raise that matter in the House because of a two-year delay in holding the inquest? There are indications now that the inquest may be put off until next year and there are unconfirmed reports of a further serious incident in a secure training centre. Will he look into the continuing lack of effective scrutiny in this place of that important subject?

Mr. Straw: Yes, and I understand the distress that has been caused to that young person's family, but also to my hon. Friend and her constituents more widely.

There is a problem about the procedure relating to coroners. There is a Coroners Bill, which I think is currently before the other place. It will not solve all the problems, but it should solve many. It will modernise the coroners system. I know from my experience as Home Secretary just how traumatic such cases can be and, of course, I will discuss the matter further with her.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): May I also associate myself with the previous comments about Eric Forth? He was a most independent-minded Member and a splendid example to us all.

I appreciate the fact that the new Leader of the House bothers to attend debates and statements. He came to the Opposition day health debate and noted my disgust that the Secretary of State for Health refuses to grapple with the situation in Shropshire in which early-stage breast cancer sufferers with Cheshire, Staffordshire or Welsh addresses can get Herceptin on the NHS paid out of their taxes, while those with a Shropshire address have to pay £47,000. I have raised the matter on several occasions at business questions. Will the Leader of the House please try to get the Secretary of State to come to the Chamber and answer questions directly, or, even better, effect a meeting between me and the Secretary of State? We now have the horror of breast cancer sufferers being camped out overnight at the primary care trust offices. The situation is dreadful and, in a civilised society such as ours, intolerable, so I would be most grateful if the new Leader of the House would intervene on it.

Mr. Straw: As the hon. Gentleman mentions, I was indeed present for the Opposition day debate on the health service. I listened carefully to the opening speeches made by the Opposition spokesman and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. The hon. Gentleman's criticisms of the way in which my right hon. Friend responded to the question are not justified. As I sat next to her, she tried to address the difficult issue. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern and that of his constituents, and I think that there is about to be some clarification on Herceptin. However, if I am wrong about that, I will of course write to him and put a note about that in the Library.

Everyone in the House has to recognise that when new drugs are developed or are specific to not only conditions such as cancer, but certain stages of cancers, there will be fine judgments to be made about when and where they ought to be used. I think that that is the problem with respect to Herceptin, but that said, and although I think that the hon. Gentleman's criticism was uncalled for, I will discuss the matter further with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I do not know whether my right hon. Friend has been following with interest the demutualisation of Standard Life. If, like me, he is a member, he will have been inundated with pro-demutualisation material. The ballot makes a local authority stock transfer look positively balanced and objective. Is it not about time that having set standards for the asset lock, the House has the opportunity to debate such demutualisations so that there is balance in the way in which they are performed?

Mr. Straw: I do not think that I am a member of Standard Life—I am sure that I would know if I was—but I have been a member of other mutual societies, so I entirely recognise what my hon. Friend is saying. I accept, too, his case that there ought to be a better balance. I know of his distinguished record as a member of the Co-operative party, and I will raise the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): I agree with what has been said about Eric Forth. He was an awkward customer and if he was here today, he would undoubtedly be the one person who would dissent from the otherwise unanimous enthusiasm for his achievements in the House.

Will the Leader of the House confirm that it is quite remarkable that a year after the general election, we have yet to have a debate on the Floor of the House about Iraq? That is a country in which British troops continue to die and it poses for the Government their greatest foreign policy dilemma, so, recognising that he will no longer have to reply to such a debate, will he show a little more enthusiasm about having one?

Mr. Straw: As a matter of fact, I was very enthusiastic about having such a debate. As I told the House last week, I was putting in requests to the former Leader of the House for a debate on Iraq, Iran and the middle east more generally. Iraq has been discussed on the Floor of the House on many occasions, although, as far as I recall, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is correct in saying that a formal debate on Iraq has not been flagged up over the past year. There will be an opportunity next week further to discuss Iraq in the context of the Armed Forces Bill. As I said in reply to the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), there will be another opportunity to discuss it in the middle of June in the debate on the European Council. As Iraq will be before the Council, I believe that it will be entirely in order to debate it at length.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): One of the biggest challenges facing the United Kingdom and the world is climate change. Under the UN framework convention on climate change, the UK has a commitment to mitigate emissions and make progress on adaptation—dealing with effects. The Government have a good and enviable record on mitigating emissions, but their record on dealing with effects and adapting to the inevitable climate change that is coming is, frankly, woeful. We have done almost nothing to adapt to the situation. Greenhouse gases and the greenhouse effect have been known about for more than 30 years and the European Union is to produce a Green Paper on the matter by the end of the year, but we are in danger of fiddling while the world burns. May we have a debate by the end of October, bearing in the mind the EU deadline, on dealing with the effects of climate change?

Mr. Straw: We have just had Environment questions, but I will do my best to ensure that there is a debate by the end of October—my hon. Friend seems to make a reasonable request. However, I resist his criticism of our record. I cannot recall any Government in the industrialised world who have been more in the lead on trying to tackle climate change than the British Government. Our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister put the matter right at the top of the G8 agenda, not because it was an easy subject or comfortable for other G8 partners, but precisely because the subject was difficult and he believed that all G8 partners needed to do more on climate change—he actually forced them to do so. I could give my hon. Friend all the numbers. He said that we have cut emissions. Our scheme reduced emissions by 1.5 million tonnes between 2002 and 2004. However, this is an international problem. Even if we were to abolish our emissions altogether, without international action by other parties, including, especially, the United States, China and India, we would be making only a marginal contribution. We are in the lead and the matter is a profound priority for the Government.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): All Prime Ministers who have been in office for many years become worn out, start to make mistakes, blame other people, start to fire their senior colleagues and lose touch with reality. Would the Leader of the House favour rushing through legislation to put a maximum term limit on a Prime Minister of nine years?

Mr. Straw: No. That would be a bad career move for the Prime Minister, and suggesting it would be a much worse career move for the Leader of the House. The hon. Gentleman's knowledge of history is slightly defective. Plenty of successful Prime Ministers have indeed gone on and on and on.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend set time aside to discuss counterfeit drugs? My constituency has the main transporter of drugs to the Scottish health service, pharmacies and hospitals. I was shocked last week to find out that there are 2,400 sites on the internet supplying drugs. It is reckoned that 80 per cent. of those drugs are counterfeit. A man was arrested in London last year who had a lab in his kitchen that was capable of producing 1 million tablets a day. Ten years ago, there were only seven transport companies distributing drugs throughout the United Kingdom, but today there are more than 400. It is very easy to set up such a company. One pays £1,500 for a licence and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has got the gist of the argument.

Mr. Straw: The illegal production of illicit drugs and the counterfeit production of drugs that are otherwise lawful is a serious problem. I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised it and I, in turn, will raise it with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Health and the Home Secretary.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): May I bring the Leader of the House back to the subject of nuclear power, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath)? The need for an urgent debate on the subject was illustrated by the right hon. Gentleman's answer, in which he managed to ignore microgeneration and energy efficiency measures, both of which would be interfered with by a decision to go nuclear. Will he comment on the view that seems to be coming from Downing street that that vastly important and potentially dangerous change in energy policy might be achieved without primary legislation? Will he ensure not only that there is a full debate in the House on the change, but that the House has an opportunity to vote on it?

Mr. Straw: The legislative base for any increase in nuclear generating capacity will of course be clear, but there is little point in the House wasting its time legislating in respect of powers that already exist. It is a classic Liberal Democratic approach: never mind the demands for new laws that are needed; let us debate laws that are not needed. There will of course be debates on the energy review and the White Paper when it is published.

The hon. Gentleman represents Cambridge, which is one of the key bases of this country's scientific establishment, where much of the work on nuclear energy was developed—

David Howarth: And renewables.

Mr. Straw: And renewables. I have to say that I would find the Liberal Democrats' claims that they oppose all nuclear and want only renewables more convincing if, at local level, they were more consistent in respect of planning permission for wind farms. I recollect that they oppose almost all planning applications for wind farms and for developments of other renewable sources of energy.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): As a fellow Scot, I associate myself with all the comments on the late Eric Forth. If there is life after death, I can look forward to enjoying exchanges with him and the late Robin Cook.

A former Member of this House who is still a Member of the other place was given a lengthy prison sentence for acting irresponsibly and endangering people's lives, but when company directors act irresponsibly and not only endanger people's lives, but cause their employees and other people to lose their lives, they are given a paltry fine, which is probably tax deductible. What are the Government doing to end that unfair and inconsistent practice and to right that wrong?

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. In fact, a quite high level of responsibility is imposed on company directors, and that has increased. Whether we should amend the law in respect of corporate manslaughter is a separate issue, and my hon. Friend may be aware that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has plans to do that. He is considering legislation, but is anxious to ensure that it is fair both to victims and potential victims and to company directors.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): May I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his handsome and generous tribute to my right hon. Friend the late Eric Forth? As others have said, the important thing about Eric Forth is that he was deadly serious about defending the rights and freedoms that over the generations this House has hard won from over-mighty Executives, and he believed, rightly, that we should do that better. We shall genuinely miss him.

The Leader of the House will, I am sure, have heard that I am to chair a big public meeting in East Grinstead tomorrow night as part of the formal consultation on the Government's wicked plan to impose excess further housing in the south-east of England. Does he agree that, by any stretch of the imagination, the scale of the developments is clearly in breach of the Government's own benchmark for sustainability? Given the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) yesterday in his urgent question on the water supply, and given the inadequacy of the roads and railways and the fact that public services in the area are extremely overstretched, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that we in this House have a chance to debate the infrastructure's inability to keep up with the Government's plans for increased house building in the south of England, particularly in Mid-Sussex?

Mr. Straw: First, I thank the hon. Gentleman for his tribute in respect of Eric Forth. The reason why the tributes have been so full is that Eric Forth cared about this place. In my judgment, caring about Parliament is not a matter of sentiment; it is absolutely fundamental to the working of our democracy and to good government.

Of course I had heard that the hon. Gentleman is to speak at the meeting tomorrow night. I am pleased to say that the news had even reached Blackburn, and I believe that train reservations are in hand.

I noticed a flicker of a smile cross the hon. Gentleman's lips as he described the plans as "wicked". Let me say to him and to other Members—particularly Opposition Members—who represent rural and suburban constituencies in the south-east that nothing would please Environment Ministers more than if no plans were necessary to increase the number of available houses in the south-east. The truth is, however, that demand for housing in the south-east greatly exceeds supply. I wish that many of the hon. Gentleman's constituents would recognise the attractions of the north-west, including my Blackburn constituency, and move there, but they are not going to. The choice for the Government, for him, for his local authority and for every other Member of the House is between allowing a dramatic and continuing increase in house prices to squeeze out the very people who need to live in those areas, and ensuring a sensible increase in housing so that prices decrease and those who live in those areas are able to stay there. That is the choice, and the debate is not helped by the use of extravagant adjectives. Every house in the country was new at one time.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Eric Forth was a close personal friend and I am deeply distressed by his early passing. Hon. Members right across the House have rightly paid generous tribute to him, and that is well merited. May I ask the Leader of the House, who gave a most generous personal tribute, to arrange a debate on how the authority of this House and the authority of the Government and the Executive might be rebalanced? There could be no better tribute to the late Eric Forth than to redress the balance between the Executive and Back-Bench Members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Straw: I know of the close friendship between the hon. Gentleman and Eric Forth. Both could often be found in the Tea Room talking about over-mighty Governments, particularly during the period of the Major Government.

The hon. Gentleman, as a former Chairman of the Procedure Committee and a member of the Modernisation Committee, will know that there are many opportunities to debate that subject. He will also know that, in a public session of the Modernisation Committee yesterday, we received evidence from three academics, one of whom made the point that the accountability of Ministers to Parliament had been strengthened significantly in the past 50 years, not least through the introduction 25 years ago of the Select Committee process. I am strongly in favour of improving the accountability, and the perception of accountability, of Ministers, but we must not believe that the position has worsened in the past 50 years when, in fact, it has got significantly better.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): On BBC2's "Newsnight" last night, the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality said that it would take at least 10 years to clear the backlog of illegal immigrants in this country. Residents of my Kettering constituency and elsewhere think that it is scandalous that those in government who are supposed to defend our country and protect our borders seem to be completely unable to do so. I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) in calling for an urgent debate on immigration and asylum in this country.

Mr. Straw: There are plenty of occasions to debate that issue, but if the Opposition feel really exercised about it they have a number of Opposition days coming up, which I am sure that they will put to good use. [Interruption.] I see the Opposition Chief Whip confirm that. I am always happy to suggest subjects to the Opposition for their debating time.

I point out to the hon. Gentleman that my hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality gave that time scale because of the time that it will take to introduce the e-borders arrangements, so that we have accurate data on the numbers going in and coming out of the country.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman tells his constituents that in 1996 the then Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), decided to abandon disembarkation controls in Dover and other ports, which covered about 40 per cent. of those leaving the country. He also got rid of all the staff and the budget for them. When I became Home Secretary, it was clear that there was no point in maintaining embarkation controls in respect of the other 60 per cent. because people who wanted to leave illegally would go through the other ports. The system that the Conservatives had maintained meant that even when disembarkation cards were taken off people, they were put in a room and nothing was done with them.

We must change the system, and that is what the Government are seeking to do. I wish that there had been slightly more help from the Opposition in respect of part of these arrangements, especially on identity cards.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): I associate myself and my hon. Friends with the glowing tributes to Eric Forth. When showing new Members round the House, I would always point out Eric Forth, and the description "colourful character" would always feature.

I do not know whether the Leader of the House saw the programme on the BBC over the weekend that showed that 52 per cent. of the British public believe that Scottish Members should no longer be able to become Prime Minister. I am certainly sure that it was not missed by No. 11. Does not this show that the public are way ahead of the House and the Government in their thinking about the role of Scottish Members? Should we not have a proper, grown-up debate about the role of us Scots MPs so that we get up to speed with the public on this issue?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman has a particular view—he would like to see Scotland separated from the rest of the United Kingdom. That is not the view taken by the vast majority of people in Scotland, nor is it the view taken by the vast majority of people in the United Kingdom. We should celebrate our Britishness. A Prime Minister is the Prime Minister for the entire United Kingdom—that is Great Britain, including Scotland and Northern Ireland. It seems to me that where he or she happens to come from is entirely irrelevant.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): May I also associate myself with the tributes that have been paid to Eric Forth? He was a politician who always made himself available to new Members to give them, as he would put it, good advice.

You have probably read, as I have, Mr. Speaker, the interview of the Leader of the House in The Times of two days ago. I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's aspirations about petitions receiving a certain amount of action rather than just a response. Will he extend that principle to popular early-day motions, which currently receive no Government response or debate in the House?

Mr. Straw: The petitions proposal is not an original proposal from me; it has been around for a while. I understand that the Scottish Parliament has a good system in place for dealing with petitions that are signed by a significant number of Members. It was my instinct to raise the matter before the Modernisation Committee and, subject to what colleagues on that Committee and other Members believe to be right, to ensure that we take more seriously petitions that are often painstakingly drawn up, with the support of many constituents and other people throughout the country. I think that that is straightforward.

An inquiry is taking place into the future of early-day motions. That is a matter for the House and certainly not one for the Government. It is a tricky issue because they are used for serious national issues, serious constituency issues and trivial issues such as the success or failure of Burnley football club.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): As a new Member, I would like to associate myself with the tributes to Eric Forth. He was unfailingly kind to those of us who were elected last year. I will miss his ready wit and his robust advice.

Now that the Government have reinstated structures in the national health service that they got rid of eight years ago, can we have a debate to reflect the real concerns of health practitioners in our constituencies who are concerned about the culture of continual change in the NHS. They just want a period of calm. They would like us to have the opportunity to reflect that in Parliament in the presence of Ministers. May we have such a debate?

Mr. Straw: I welcome all debates on the national health service—on what we have done nationally and on what happens locally. I hope very much that in such debates, Opposition Members, including those who are new, will be honest enough to talk about the state that the NHS would have been in had Conservative spending plans continued, and had the Government accepted their advice when each year—almost without exception—they voted against the spending plans proposed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If Conservative spending plans had continued, there would not have been the dramatic increase in the numbers of nurses, doctors and other clinicians—there has been an 85,000 increase in the number of nurses. There would also not have been a dramatic increase—it was increased by more than a quarter—in the real pay of nurses. Instead, there would have been the same stagnation in the health service, and, as a result, there would have been lower delivery of care for the hon. Gentleman's constituents and for the constituents of every other Member of this place.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will remember next week those hon. Members who have not been called today.

Points of Order

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I received a reply from the Minister for Energy to a letter that I wrote to the Prime Minister about nuclear power. His letter said that the outcome of the energy review has not been pre-determined and that no decisions have been taken on the need for new nuclear power stations. He said that it was a genuine energy review. That is at odds with what the Prime Minister has stated. It is clearly essential that hon. Members are given—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for the Chair. I am not responsible for what any Minister has to say, whether it be the Prime Minister or any other Minister. The hon. Gentleman will have to take up the matter—the contradictions—with the Ministers concerned.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On the Order Paper today there is notice of a written ministerial statement on the Royal Mail. You may have heard the content of the statement being discussed on the "Today" programme this morning. I wonder whether that was with some foreknowledge that the House did not possess.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there was a written statement. Information has been given to the House and it is available in the Vote Office.

Members' Salaries and Chairmen's Pay

12.28 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move

That, in the opinion of this House, the following provisions shall be made with respect to the salaries of Members of this House, including the additional salaries determined in accordance with the Resolutions of this House (as amended from time to time) of 30th October 2003 relating to Pay for Chairmen of Select Committees (No. 2) and 13th July 2005 relating to Pay for Chairmen of Standing Committees (No. 2)—

For the year starting with 1st April 2006 the yearly rate shall be increased in two stages—

(a) with effect from 1st April, by 1 per cent., and

(b) with effect from 1st November, to the yearly rate determined in accordance with the Resolution of this House of 10th July 1996 relating to Members' Salaries.

Mr. Speaker: With this we will consider the two motions on the pay of Chairmen of Select Committees.

Mr. Straw: The motion on Members' salaries will give effect to the proposal announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 30 March that the pay increases for Members of Parliament for 2006-07 should be staged, with the full increase being deferred until 1 November rather than being payable from 1 April last. The proposal is made in the context of the Government's response to the 28th report of the Senior Salaries Review Body, which provides that the award to the senior civil service, to which Members' pay is linked under the formula agreed in 1996, is being staged in a similar way.

Under the decisions taken in 2003 and 2005, annual uprating of the additional salaries for Select and Standing Committee Chairmen is also linked to the senior civil service pay bands. The motion accordingly provides that the increase in these salaries too should be staged.

Under these proposals, the salary of a Member of Parliament will be £59,686 from 1 April and £60,277 from 1 November. The principle of linkage to the senior civil service pay bands, agreed by the House in 1996, followed earlier systems of linkage. It was intended to avoid the need for a major debate on Members' pay on every occasion when pay needed to be adjusted. However, the system agreed does not cover the present situation, because the pay bands to which our pay is linked would have risen by the full 2 per cent. from 1 April. If nothing further were done, our pay would rise by 2 per cent. from that date, even though this would not be the case in practice for most of the senior civil service.

When he proposed this staging of the senior civil service pay increase, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced that it was to "reflect what is affordable within expenditure plans."

I accept that the total saving to the public purse from the staging of the pay of Members of Parliament itself will be relatively small. It amounts to less than £230,000 in basic pay, and a little more than that if other factors—employers' national insurance contributions and Exchequer pensions contributions—are included.

[Mr. Jack Straw]

I hope that colleagues agree that we ought to play our part and show restraint, as we are asking the senior civil service, to whose pay ours is linked, to show equal restraint.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): As the House knows, the Senior Salaries Review Body has made some critical recommendations on Members' pay, and it has established comparators in both the public and the private sectors. Does the Leader of the House accept that Members' pay is 20 per cent. behind the comparators to which it has been linked by the SSRB? Is that fair in the short, medium or long term for hon. Members? Will it encourage good, competent, able, intelligent people to put their names forward as Members of Parliament?

Mr. Straw: I accept the point that the hon. Gentleman is making, and I shall deal with the wider review of Members' pay that will take place next year. As comparable pay in the private sector has risen much faster than pay for senior civil servants, they too are out of kilter with the comparators, so I accept the strength of that argument.

In its review next year the SSRB must take account of the extent to which pay levels act as a disincentive, deterring good people in all walks of life from serving in the House. It is important that Members of Parliament be paid properly, and—as members of all parties aspire to hold office—that should include Ministers. At the same time, however, I am struck by the high calibre of members of all parties who entered the House in 2001 and 2005, notwithstanding the pay and the cynical press that Members of Parliament generally receive. However, if pay does not keep pace with the comparators, particularly as the pressure on Members of Parliament to serve full-time is much greater than it was when the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and I came to the House almost three decades ago—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: It was more than three decades ago, in my case.

Mr. Straw: Indeed. In those circumstances there will be a disincentive, deterring good people not only from entering the House but, if they do enter it, from staying .

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House confirm that it is mandatory for the SSRB to hold that review, as there appears to be some doubt in its mind?

Mr. Straw: I have been handed a note saying that the broader questions will be dealt with in the SSRB's triennial review, which is due in 2007. If I am wrong—and I intend to talk to the chairman shortly—I will make that known to the House. However, I have every reason to believe that there will be a full review next year—and that view is being confirmed by the nods of officials in the Box.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): It might be more appropriate to confirm this at the end of the debate or afterwards, but what is the date of the triennial review? I understand that it was due to take place this year rather than next year.

Mr. Straw: I shall certainly confirm the date for the right hon. Lady.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: May I point out that Members of Parliament are in a unique position? Members entering the House for the first time—there were many such Members at the last election—receive the same pay as a Member of Parliament who has served in the House for 25, 30, 35 or even 40 years. It is important that Members' pay keep pace with the comparators, otherwise there is a grave unfairness for Members who serve with loyalty and distinction in the House. I include the Leader of the House in that category.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I have received a note saying that the review was to be commissioned this year, and will report next year. I have rather fewer complaints about my pay because, as I am a member of the Cabinet, it is a little more than the hon. Gentleman's. I hope that the review will look at the issue of whether there should be an age and experience-related band, as it is perfectly possible to construct a series of steps—

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Oh, no.

Mr. Straw: Hang on a sec. It is perfectly possible to construct a pay system in which Members are paid according to age and time spent in the House. Whether that is acceptable to the public purse, and above all to hon. Members, is another matter. There has been an improvement, however, as Chairmen of Select Committees and equivalent bodies, including members of the Speaker's Panel, receive additional remuneration. The only people who do not receive such remuneration are members of the shadow Cabinet, who have to work extremely hard and are not paid properly for that work. However, that is an incentive to leave the shadows and enter Government. I hope that everyone accepts the case for staging, which is the subject of the motion.

May I deal with the two motions on payment for Chairmen of the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill, both of which make the same proposition? The House decided to introduce payments for the Chairmen of the main Select Committees in 2003, following a debate in 2002 on the principle of payment arising from a report of the Modernisation Committee and from a subsequent report by the SSRB on the amount payable. In July 2005 we decided that that should be extended to nearly all the remaining permanent Committees. We decided, too, that a system of payment should be introduced for members of the Chairmen's Panel who chair Standing Committees.

The main purpose of the decision to pay Chairmen of Select Committees was to promote recognition of another career choice in the House as an alternative to service as a Minister. It reflected a recognition of the importance of Select Committees in underpinning a modern democracy, and a general agreement that the chairmanship of many Committees involves a heavy work load and substantial responsibility. The House would wish me to take the opportunity to say how much we value the work of Select Committees and to thank the various Chairmen for their commitment. The decision to pay Chairmen was by no means unanimous, but the House as a whole has shown that it supports the principle by subsequently extending the list of Chairmen who receive the additional salary.

Chairmen of non-permanent Committees have not been paid, partly because they do not fit the criteria as clearly as other Chairmen. By definition, such Committees are relatively short-lived, although the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, which was ably chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), has just reported after four months and more than 20 sittings. It would be difficult to identify in advance which Committees should be covered and which should not. However, where there is an exceptional case, I hope that colleagues agree that we should reflect that in arrangements for the payment of salaries.

The Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill appears to be such a case. It first sat on 13 December, and it sits up to four times a week when the House is sitting. Until last week it had sat on 36 days, so as it typically sits twice a day, it has many more sittings than other Committees. It may continue to sit—but perhaps not at the same rate—until the autumn. The House will agree that its work load is higher than that of many other Committees whose members are paid an additional salary. It is higher, too, than the work load of other ad hoc committees.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Undoubtedly members of Committees considering private legislation—the Crossrail Bill Committee is such a Committee—undertake an awful lot of hard work, but I find it difficult to distinguish the additional work by Chairmen from that of the membership, as they both seem to do exactly the same job in the same circumstances.

Mr. Straw: It could be said that assiduous members of Select Committees do the same job as, say, the Chairman of a Select Committee who happens to be coasting. There is no precise science. All Members who are doing their duties in the House work very hard—far harder, I may say, than they get credit for, regardless of party, from many sections of the press. But there is a difference between chairing a Committee and being a member of it. There is plainly a difference in responsibility. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman does not seek to make the best the enemy of the good, and will accept that there is an exception to the general rule to be made here.

I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) for the work that he has done as Chairman of the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill. Had he simply been coasting, had he not been taking his responsibilities seriously, I would not have tabled the motion and Members on both sides would not have accepted it. I accept that to add this Committee to the list of Committees whose Chairmen receive an additional salary will set something of a precedent. We will have to look at other cases as they arise, and it is not inconceivable that another Select Committee on a Bill may at some future point justify similar treatment. However, I do not envisage that we will have for some time another ad hoc Committee involving the work commitment for its Chairman that that one involves. It is a matter for the House to decide, but I think it is right to put the motion forward to provide an opportunity for the Chamber as a whole to make that decision.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I support all three motions before the House relating to Members' salaries and the pay of Chairmen of Select Committees.

I am grateful to the Leader of the House for having recognised that the staging of Members' pay does not in itself constitute a very large saving for the Government. However, as others, with whom we have been compared and linked in respect of the decision on our pay, are being asked to take their pay in stages, it is appropriate that we undertake the same level of restraint as we expect of them.

The Leader of the House referred to the wider issue, partly in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton). The pay of Members of Parliament is a difficult matter, with which Governments and Members have grappled over the years. We have not necessarily found the best way to deal with Members' pay. It is Members who vote on our pay, and voters raise questions about it. They are often encouraged in that by members of the press, whose salaries are not revealed to the electorate or to their readership.

There is an issue that we need to address, and the SSRB triennial review will consider the wider aspects when it reports. I am grateful to the Leader of the House for clarifying that that will be commissioned later this year and will report next year. The question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) is important, concerning the mandatory nature of that report. The report is not produced at the whim of the Prime Minister; a resolution was passed that a triennial review should take place.

Sir Michael Spicer: The resolution is cited on the Order Paper; it was motion 14 at the time.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification. I am sure the Leader of the House has noted the point and the motion number, to ensure that the process goes ahead and there is no way that the triennial review can be stymied by a prime ministerial decision.

The wider issue is important. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the need to encourage high-calibre people to want to become Members of Parliament, and to the fact that these days this is a full-time job. That is not necessarily a view that will be shared by all my colleagues, or in other parts of the House, but my personal view is that it is a full-time job and we should treat it as such, as I have always done.

[Mrs. May]

That presents a challenge to those who are employed in areas where salaries are above those of Members of Parliament, which in the past may not have been the case. It is no longer the case that higher salaries are paid only to those in a significant role in business or banking, or who are barristers or in similar professions. A head teacher of a secondary school, for example, almost certainly earns more than a Member of Parliament.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Similarly, a superintendent of police.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. There are a number of areas of employment where salaries are higher than those of Members of Parliament, which would not have been so in the past. People of very high calibre still wish to be Members of Parliament, but sometimes that involves them and their families making significant sacrifices to enable them to give their service to the country. We need to consider the issue.

I crave the indulgence of the House to raise one further point that cannot be accommodated by the SSRB triennial review, but which is a matter for all parties—the cost of standing as a candidate for election to Parliament. That can be a significant cost, particularly to someone nursing a seat for three or four years, if they are selected well in advance of an election. That presents a challenge to parties too, to ensure that we encourage high-calibre people to enter the House, as we are all keen to do.

On the pay of Chairmen of Select Committees, the right decision was taken by the House. It was an important step offering Members a different career structure, so that they do not have to become Ministers to feel that they are progressing and earning extra salary. The Leader of the House mentioned members of the shadow Cabinet. Having been a member of the shadow Cabinet since 1999, I, perhaps more than others, am conscious of the point. Members of the shadow Cabinet assume that burden with no extra pay over and above that of Members of Parliament.

The key issue is that the role of Select Committee Chairman offers an alternative career. In earlier exchanges during business questions, the Leader of the House referred to the introduction of the Select Committee system in the House. That has been one of the great strengths of the House over the past 25 years, and it is important that we recognise the value of that through the pay of Chairmen of Select Committees.

On the Crossrail Bill, I entirely understand the intervention by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) about the fact that all the members of the Committee take on a substantial burden because of the number of meetings of the Committee. I say openly and honestly that I would not like to be a member of that Committee. I intend to give evidence to it because Crossrail affects my constituency, but it is a detailed issue and a significant burden to meet and take so much evidence from those who have submitted petitions against the Crossrail Bill.

It can be argued that for members of any Select Committee there is a burden if they do their job assiduously, which I know members of Select Committees do, but the Chairman of such a Committee has an extra burden to bear, and it is appropriate that the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill be added to the list of those whose Chairmen who are paid. The Leader of the House made a valid point when he said that we cannot guarantee that in future other Committees will not need to be added. Now that he has finally been allowed to become Chairman of the Modernisation Committee, after a little local difficulty, he will know that, as became clear from the evidence taken yesterday, one of the current issues concerns the role of Select Committees, Standing Committees and Special Select Committees in the future. If the Modernisation Committee proposes changes to the way in which the House handles legislation and the legislative process, so that the balance between Select Committees and Standing Committees and their various responsibilities evolves, we may need to look again at the whole question of whom it is appropriate to pay.

I welcome the fact that Select Committee Chairmen are now paid—that has been an important move for the House—and I endorse the adding of the Chairman of the Crossrail Bill Committee to the list of those whose salary is increased in recognition of the extra work that they are doing.

12.50 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is always difficult when we discuss our own salaries and emoluments in this House. I must admit that many hon. Members whom I number among my friends and acquaintances regret the fact that it falls to me to speak from the Liberal Democrat Front Bench on such matters, because I have something of a reputation for taking a puritanical view of them. Indeed, I am very clear that in fact and in perception we must be extraordinarily careful that we do not seem to be giving ourselves preferential treatment above those who serve in the public service or the private sector beyond this place. For instance, when we discussed the enhancements made to the pensions of right hon. and hon. Members, I was opposed because I felt that it was a clear example of an occasion when we were protecting our interests rather better than we were able to protect those of many other people.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I share the hon. Gentleman's concern, but if I remember the options on the pension correctly, one could either take it or increase it. What did he do?

Mr. Heath: I did not take it, but that is neither here nor there. I do not want to parade that as an example of virtue—it was simply the way that I felt about the issue.

We must also, however, be fair to Members of Parliament. We have to reflect the comparators that are set down and ensure that Members' salaries are commensurate with the responsibilities that they take on. It worries me when Members' pay falls way behind those comparators. I agree with the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) that the job of a Member of Parliament should be to represent people in this place, not to go off and do some other job down the road. It always surprises and sometimes shocks me when somebody leaves high office, or even shadow responsibilities, and the first thing that the newspapers say is, "What job is he going to do now?" The answer is the job of a Member of Parliament, which is still their prime responsibility. It worries me that so many Members feel the need to top up their salaries in all sorts of ways. I cannot believe that that is to the advantage of their constituents. Of course, every individual has to take a view for themselves.

The Leader of the House cited the quality of the recent intake of Members. I agree. I think that we had an extraordinarily talented intake on both sides of the House this time.

Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): Hear, hear.

Mr. Heath: Even the hon. Gentleman who says, "Hear, hear", whom I perceive to be one of the new intake, will recognise that we have had some very talented individuals joining us. However, although that may be a seductive argument for saying that we can therefore allow market forces to do their work and allow salaries to dwindle, it is wrong. It would be a complacent view, and an unfair one. Greater self-sacrifice is required, not only by Members but by their families, which is sometimes inappropriate. Having for several years led a county council with an annual turnover of about £500,000 on the basis that total expenses were about £4,000 per annum, I know how difficult it is to make such sacrifices in order to achieve one's political objectives.

Sir Michael Spicer: All the difficult questions that the hon. Gentleman is posing are surely meant to be sorted out by the Senior Salaries Review Body. Would not the answer be for us simply to accept its recommendations?

Mr. Heath: That is by far the simplest way of dealing with it, and it takes the matter out of the political argument, which is as it should be. I would hope that it takes an objective and independent view, not one clouded by the misconceptions of bundling up all our office expenses—for example, staff and computers—into our salary and saying that they are perks for the individual concerned. All those factors are removed from the equation and we have an objective view.

I entirely support the contention of the Leader of the House in the first motion. Given that the Government have determined that civil service pay should be staged, it would be wrong of us to seek an advantageous position, and we should accept that recommendation.

That brings me on to the payment of the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill. I have genuine problems with that. I hasten to add that that has nothing to do with either the person or the qualities of the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale), and everything to do with the apparent lack of discipline and control over the process—a process that I generally welcome. Those who chair Select Committees of the House undertake a very substantial job and generally do so with a great deal of assiduity and sheer hard work. I can readily accept that there should be a career structure within the House and that it should be rewarded, but I have always been reluctant for it to be greatly expanded. I agree with the right hon. Member for Maidenhead that we are rapidly approaching the situation whereby the only people who will not be paid extra are those who do a great deal of the work of the House by speaking from the Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front Benches on each and every Bill and attending Standing Committees to speak as required, and do so without any extra emolument at all. I hasten to add that I am not seeking that extra emolument, but merely pointing out that it is a rather perverse situation.

We now have payments for the Chairmen on the Chairmen's Panel who chair our Standing Committees. Again, I do not argue with that. It is a gradated structure. However, naming a specific temporary Committee sets an unhelpful precedent. The motion makes no provision—although it is clearly implied—that the payment should cease at the point at which the Select Committee reports. However, I have a more substantial objection. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Mansfield is a member of the Chairmen's Panel—if so, he is receiving a payment as such—but I suspect that he is not. That is surprising. Hon. Members who are put on a Select Committee on private legislation undertake a truly horrendous task. It is very time-consuming and difficult work that is usually, frankly, given as a punishment by the Whips Office for some misdemeanour, and I have the greatest sympathy for those who undertake it. But the fact remains that that hard work is shared by all the members of the Committee. It is not like being the Chairman of a departmental Select Committee. Those Chairmen do a tremendous amount of work outside the Committee, meeting individuals, preparing for meetings and guiding the reports that the Committee produces. They do a whole array of further work, but I do not believe that that is the role of the Chairman of a private Bill Committee. The work of those Committees is shared by all their members.

I do not intend to show any disrespect to the hon. Member for Mansfield, who I know is doing very good job of work, but he is not there all the time, and I believe that up to four other Members have also chaired that Bill Committee. So it seems odd to reward only one member of the Committee, quite substantially under the terms of this provision, for doing that temporary job. Furthermore, it is not clear to me from my reading of the resolution whether this is an annualised payment in line with those of other Select Committee Chairmen, on whether there is a pro rata element related to the timing of the Bill. It would be helpful to know that.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman will take my intervention as confirmation of his theory about punishment. May I tell him that I was asked, although not instructed, to sit on the Committee on the Crossrail Bill? However, I declined the invitation.

Mr. Heath: As I have no idea of the hon. Gentleman's present relationship with his Whips, I cannot possibly comment. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (John Pugh) was certainly not given his post as a punishment. He is there as a willing conscript, although he might now be regretting having been prepared to take on those responsibilities.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: How was the Chair of the Crossrail Bill Committee chosen? Was he chosen by members of the Committee, or was the decision made through the usual channels? This is an important issue when we are talking about Members of Parliament getting a very substantial additional sum tacked on to their salary.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman has asked an extremely important question. No doubt the Leader of the House will be able to answer it when he responds to the debate. If there was a genuine election within the membership of the Committee, that would be one thing. However, if there was an instruction to the effect that someone had been favoured with the chairmanship of the Committee and was to receive a substantial emolument as a result, that would change the view of the House on what exactly is going on. For all those reasons, I really need to be convinced that this is a sensible way forward.

Mr. Martlew: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman's argument, but I do not quite understand it. If the Chairman of that Bill Committee were a member of the Chairmen's Panel, he would be paid. If he were the Chair of a Select Committee, he would be paid. So why should he not receive payment for chairing this particular Committee?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Member for Mansfield would be paid rather less if he were a member of the Chairmen's Panel. He would be paid as a prospective Standing Committee Chairman, which, by a resolution of the House, would depend on his experience in the role, but he would still receive considerably less than the rate of pay that is felt to be appropriate for a Select Committee Chairman.

The anomaly is that this Bill Committee is described as a Select Committee but it is not a departmental Select Committee—[Interruption.] The Leader of the House objects to my use of the word "anomaly", so I shall retract it. However, such Committees are a kind of hybrid between a Standing Committee and a Select Committee. Many other temporary Committees are set up for similar purposes, and the only logical conclusion is that anyone who chairs any Committee of the House in any circumstances ought to have a temporary pay increase—

Mr. Straw: Yes, I have got the point.

Mr. Heath: That being the case, I shall not detain the House further by repeating my arguments. I would love to be convinced that the proposals represent a sensible way forward, but I cannot see that at the moment.

1.4 pm

Mr. Straw: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate. I am glad to hear that there is general approbation for the first motion, which is to restrict our pay increase to just 1 per cent., and widespread agreement with the second and third motions on the Chairman of the Crossrail Bill.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) raised a fundamental point about how we settle our pay, in saying that we have always had difficulties because we have to vote on our own pay. This is almost unique, except for those who run a company that they wholly own. I remember the debates that took place on this matter in the late 1970s and early 1980s, when the system was much worse than it is today. In those days, there was no linkage, which was just awful. The system of linkage is much better, because it provides a clear benchmark. I am not sure whether we could devise a better system, although—to pick up the points made by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and others—we must not forget the important associated issue of what the benchmark should be. We need to ensure that the salaries of Members of Parliament keep up with certain comparators, without any shifts being offensive to our constituents.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead also made an interesting point about the cost to people of standing as a candidate. It would be hard to make the case that such costs should become a charge on the public purse directly, although they are onerous—

Mrs. May indicated dissent.

Mr. Straw: No, I know that the right hon. Lady was not suggesting that.

I must point out to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that I was not suggesting that, because the level of talent that has been elected to the House in recent Parliaments, particularly since 1997, when the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) entered the House—

John Bercow: Your cheque is in the post.

Mr. Straw: Thank you very much.

The fact that the level of talent has been high does not mean that we should not consider fair remuneration for Members. My point is that, despite the fact that the rewards here are modest—and less than what most Members of Parliament could command if they worked elsewhere—it is interesting that people of talent still enter the House. That happens despite, rather than because of, the remuneration system here.

Mrs. May: Purely to set the record straight, may I tell the Leader of the House that I was not suggesting in any way that the cost of standing as a parliamentary candidate should be a drain on the public purse? However, all parties need to examine these issues, particularly as we are trying to encourage greater diversity among the people coming into the House.

Mr. Straw: I accept the right hon. Lady's point. That issue is the subject of separate inquiries into the funding of political parties, and into whether those parties should be able to pay some of those expenses. All hon. Members have made substantial financial sacrifices when trying to become Members of Parliament.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome talked about the Chairman of the Crossrail Bill Committee. First, he can be assured that the post is time limited. If the Crossrail Bill Committee ceases to exist, that salary will cease to be paid to the Chair. This is not the 18th century; this is the 21st century.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) asked how the Chairman of that Committee had been chosen. The answer is that it is a combination of the usual channels—

Mr. Prentice: Ah, I thought so!

Mr. Straw: But it is also up to the Committee itself. It is the same arrangement as for a Select Committee. It does not involve a Chairmen's Panel nomination. So the usual channels ensure that, by some osmotic process, a name comes forward. That Member becomes a member of the Committee and—hey presto!—all other members of the Committee, by an entirely democratic free vote, approve that person. That seems to work fine—[Laughter.] If my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle wants some of this, he should just see me and I will do my best to ensure that he receives similar favour.

John Bercow: Will the Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Straw: One second. Somebody outrageously suggested that places on hybrid and private Bill Committees are reserved for punishments by the Whips. I am sure that that is still true in the Conservative party; it is no longer true in the Labour party and the Government, because we now have a caring, sharing Whips Office that does everything by gentle persuasion. However, it certainly was true, as I remember— [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Maidenhead says that her Chief Whip is also very nice. He, of course, gets paid, unlike members of the shadow Cabinet.

As a shadow Cabinet member for 10 years, it always rankled that I was expected to work my socks off and speak on behalf of the party while not being paid a penny, whereas our Chief Whip, who was expected simply to dragoon people into the Lobby and not speak at all, was paid a large sum. There we are; it just gets one used to life in government.

If I might detain the House for a moment on the issue of punishment by the Whips, I remember that such punishment took place in the 1980s in respect of a close friend of mine, with whom I shared an office, the late Allan Roberts. He was a good parliamentarian, but an outrageous roué and bon viveur, and was the Member for Bootle until his sad death in 1990.

Allan had been offending the Whips in a variety of ways and was told that he had to serve his time by going on a private Bill Committee. As so often, he got into trouble; he failed to turn up to the private Bill Committee and was told that he would be fined about £50 for each failure. He came to me, and I had to try to bail him out—not for the first time, let me say, nor indeed the last.

With that digression, I hope that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome will accept that, although this is something of a precedent, without precedents—if we were against them—nothing would ever be done for the first time. This is a new situation, and I hope he accepts that this is a fair way to proceed. I am grateful to those on the Conservative Front Bench for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, in the opinion of this House, the following provisions shall be made with respect to the salaries of Members of this House, including the additional salaries determined in accordance with the Resolutions of this House (as amended from time to time) of 30th October 2003 relating to Pay for Chairmen of Select Committees (No. 2) and 13th July 2005 relating to Pay for Chairmen of Standing Committees (No. 2)—

For the year starting with 1st April 2006 the yearly rate shall be increased in two stages—

(a) with effect from 1st April, by 1 per cent., and

(b) with effect from 1st November, to the yearly rate determined in accordance with the Resolution of this House of 10th July 1996 relating to Members' Salaries.

PAY FOR CHAIRMEN OF SELECT COMMITTEES

Resolved,

That this House expresses the opinion that, as from 13th December 2005, the Resolution of the House of 30th October 2003, relating to Pay for Chairmen of Select Committees (No. 2), as amended by the Resolution of 13th July 2005, should be further amended by leaving out 'or the Committee on Standards and Privileges' and inserting 'the Committee on Standards and Privileges or the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill'. —[Mr. Straw.]

PAY FOR CHAIRMEN OF SELECT COMMITTEES (NO. 2)

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, as from 13th December 2005, the Resolution of the House of 30th October 2003, relating to Pay for Chairmen of Select Committees (No. 2), as amended by the Resolution of 13th July 2005, is further amended by leaving out 'or the Committee on Standards and Privileges' and inserting 'the Committee on Standards and Privileges or the Select Committee on the Crossrail Bill'.—[Mr. Straw.]

Association of Former Members of Parliament

1.13 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the formation of the Association of Former Members of Parliament in response to the Resolution of the House of 2nd May 2001; notes that it now has a membership of over 330 former Members; acknowledges the work done by the Association and its Executive Committee; and welcomes the financial and other assistance accorded to the Association by the House of Commons Commission.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) will speak in greater detail on this issue, because he has been chairing a working group on support for former Members. Those of us who have been lucky enough to survive in the House over many elections, as I have, will have friends who are no longer Members. Some retired at an appropriate moment—we wish them all well in their retirement—but many either got squeezed out because of gratuitous boundary redistributions or lost their seats. That happened to a large number of my colleagues in the 1980s, and it also happened to Conservative colleagues in the 1990s and at the 2001 election.

Many of those who lost their seats were assiduous Members of Parliament. They had given up careers and quite high incomes, and often put great strains on their families, but they suddenly found themselves outside the House and at a loss as to their future. That is a risk that we all accept when we are elected to the House, but I have often been struck by the lack not of support in terms of pensions, which are reasonable these days, although not for people who retired some time ago, but of psychological support and recognition of the contribution that those people made to the running of the House.

Shortly before the 2001 election, our former colleague, Joe Ashton, who was just about to retire, led an informal cross-party group looking at what could be done to assist the position of former Members of Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who was then Leader of the House, facilitated a short debate in May 2001, just before the general election, which led, in effect, to the establishment of a working party to report to the Speaker. The motion identified the desire of former Members to stay in contact with each other and the possible benefits of availability of sources of personal advice and assistance for those who might have got into difficulties.

As I say, my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle will go into more detail, but I understand that the association has more than 330 members, including a former Prime Minister and a former Speaker. Any such association needs some material support, but I understand that our association funds most of its activities from subscription. However, some modest financial support and assistance in kind have been made available by the House of Commons Commission. That will continue.

The Commission considered that "in due course the view of the House should be sought on this assistance, so that it can be put on a steadier footing".

The main purpose of tabling the motion is to allow the House to give its view. We are being asked to give broad endorsement of the Commission's approach, but not to take responsibility for specific decisions, which remain a matter for the Commission. I am extremely happy to give that endorsement. I hope that the House as a whole does so to.

1.16 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am also happy to give that endorsement. Any large organisation has clubs, societies and groupings for former members of staff, which are for people who retire in the natural way of things. Of course, many Members of the House lose their jobs, and that can come as a great shock to them. Politics is a brutal business in that sense. Therefore, the proposal seems entirely sensible. Indeed, it seems a little odd that it took so long for a grouping or association of former Members to be formed.

I pay tribute to the work of all those former Members and Members of the House who have been involved in getting the association up and running and in ensuring that it is provided with the support it needs. I am entirely happy to endorse that important, albeit limited, support that the Commission has agreed the House may give.

I would like to make a further point. There are many ways in which Members of the House can continue to learn from former Members. On a specific issue, I am very grateful for the support that Dame Marion Roe is giving to those of us who are trying to encourage more women into the House, particularly on the Conservative Benches. She is giving practical support and advice to women. It is good of former Members to be willing to do that. We should never forget the experience that they have, which can be of benefit to current Members and to the House generally.

1.17 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I am delighted to speak to the motion. On 2 May 2001 we had the original motion before the House. Of course, if it had not been for the outbreak of foot and mouth disease, the debate would never have taken place. After it, the Speaker asked me to form a working group to see whether we could get an association up and running.

I was flattered by that and I wondered whether the Speaker realised that I had a background in human resources—I used to be personnel manager for a large multinational company. So, I delved into this a little further, but the reality was that I was one of only three Members who were sitting on the Benches when the debate took place. I was the obvious candidate.

The work has gone well, but when I was appointed to the post, I wondered why we had never had a formal association. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) has asked that question today from the Conservative Front Bench. Throughout the world, Parliaments similar to ours all have their associations. I then realised that the reason for us not having an association for former Members is down at the other end of the building. In fact, we have an association, and it is called the House of Lords. It has been there for many centuries, but only elite former Members went to it. If what I hear is to be believed, it will be even more difficult for Members of this House to get to the other House, so I am sure that the need for the association will increase.

The working group reported to the Speaker and the then Leader of the House, and it was successful. The association of former Members now has, I think, 340 members, including two former Prime Ministers and 32 former Cabinet Ministers. They need no advice from us about how to run their business, as many of them have run the country, some of them well and some not so well.

As the Leader of the House pointed out, there was a need for this association, and the main need was for fellowship. This place is a closed community, and suddenly finding oneself on the outside is difficult when most Members live in their constituencies and are unlikely to meet one of their work colleagues walking down the street. Some successful social gatherings have taken place, and I want to put on the record our thanks for the support of Speaker Martin in that regard. The Administration Committee, which was at first reluctant to accept the demands of the association, has also been helpful.

Progress has been made. When the association was started, a former Member had to have completed 15 years' service before being given permission to come into the House without having to go through security and wear a label with a date on it. That has now improved greatly. Former Members found it shaming to have to go through that procedure and felt that their contribution merited better. An office has been provided, which is welcomed by the association. The small amount of financial support provided helps to pay the association's postage costs. It has been fortunate to employ a part-time secretary, Sally Grocott—"employ" is perhaps not the right word, as I am not sure that she gets paid or gets paid regularly. As she knows the House—her husband is Chief Whip in the other place—she has been a tower of strength to the association.

The driving force behind the association, however, has been Joe Ashton. I have worked closely with him and he tires me out. Given the amount of energy that he puts into his role, he probably retired too early. The association has been fortunate to have him. Nothing is ever good enough for Joe, so we must go further and faster. He now has an all-party, mixed-gender executive that represents various regions of the United Kingdom. The House would be proud to form an executive on such a basis were it ever able to do so. Members are aware of its success, because it produces a newspaper, "Order Order", three times a year, which is now circulated with The House Magazine.

The association has asked me to raise one or two issues. First, it has asked me to raise the issue of the pension fund trustees. I served for many years as a pension fund trustee and, believe me, it is not a glamorous committee. It is perhaps a bit like that on the Crossrail Bill, but the chairman does not get paid. The law says that there should be pensioner trustees. At present, we have a pensioner trustee, who was not nominated by the association but is a member of it. The association has asked whether it can be consulted in future about the retired trustee on the pension fund, which is a reasonable request, and whether there could be more than one retired trustee on the pension fund. I hope that that suggestion will be communicated through the usual channels back to the fund trustees.

Secondly, the association asked me to raise the issue of the Members' Fund, of which, for my pains, I am also a member. I am conscious that the vast majority of Members of Parliament know nothing about the Members' Fund—they just know from their payslip that they make a £2 contribution to it every month. In reality, it is a fund for assisting former Members of Parliament or their spouses and family—the assistance is normally to spouses and family who might have fallen into some kind of financial difficulty. The laws on the fund were passed by the House in about 1935 and need revising. Members of the association understand that. If the laws are revised, however, they would like a retired association member to be a member of the Members' Fund.

I also want to raise the issue, on which the Leader of the House touched, of how we treat Members who lose their seats. Some work has been done on that, and I thought that I had secured an agreement with the usual channels that when a Member loses a seat, he or she can use part of the winding-up allowance to get expert help on returning to the labour market. A Member of Parliament who has been out of his or her profession for 10 years will find it difficult to get back into the labour market. The multinational company for which I worked would bring in consultants to assist those who had been made redundant with their CVs and advise them on their career prospects and future direction. That does not happen here. My understanding—which was wrong, as it did not happen—was that Members, if they so wished, could use part of the winding-up allowance for those purposes. I hope that that will have been provided for by the time of the next general election.

Mr. David Wilmick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree—this did not apply to me, although I lost my seat, and I was fortunate enough to be in employment within a week—that the process can be pretty undignified when a Member loses a seat? Several former Members, no doubt on both sides of the House, have needed to get permission from the authorities to come here and collect their papers and so on, perhaps a few days after a general election. A more dignified approach is required to deal with those who have lost their seats, not only to help them in the way that my hon. Friend has suggested, but to make it easier for them to collect papers and do other things that one would do normally when leaving one's employment.

Mr. Martlew: I totally accept that, and I understand that the matter is being considered. I have heard the process described as being similar to what happens when an employee has been instantly dismissed—someone will come to the person's office, help him or her to gather their papers and see them off the premises. That cannot be right. Of course, there is pressure of time—the work of the House starts again soon after the general election, and desks and so on must be available. However, the issue must be treated more sensitively. The issue in relation to passes is similar. Often, Members have felt ashamed to come back into the House through the security system. Since we have made changes, the House is a much more welcoming place to former Members.

My final point is that the amount of money made available to the association is probably less than £2,000. I realise that that is public money, and we must be careful with it. However, outside this place, a civil service retirement association or a large company would be more generous. When the House of Commons Commission considers the matter, I hope that it will see its way to being a little more generous.

I am grateful that this motion is on the Order Paper today. I am sure that all Members of the House realise that, sooner or later, they will be a former Member. I am not planning to lose my seat at the next general election, but one can never tell. We should take credit for what we have done. Some members of the association complain about the pensions and salaries that we receive and compare them with the amounts that they received, and they are right to do so; but we did set up the association. They had the opportunity to set it up, and did not do so.

When we are former Members, the association will make leaving this place better for us. We have already made it a great deal better for our colleagues and friends who left at the last election.

1.30 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I want to express not just congratulations but thanks to the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew), and to all who have been instrumental in setting up the association and making it work as it has. It represents an important advance in what we do for former Members. I also agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about further steps that could be taken. It is extraordinary that although we spend all our time here referring to each other, quite properly, as "the hon. Gentleman" and "the hon. Lady" in accordance with the formalities of the House, the moment a seat is lost the Member is apparently no longer an hon. Gentleman or an hon. Lady, and cannot be trusted to clear his or her desk in good order. That is an indignity that we do not need to visit on those who are inevitably distraught at their position.

In too many instances, the structures of the House are based on the assumption that someone who leaves is a member of the landed or money gentry to whom attending the House has been merely a pastime for a certain number of years, who can simply return to his estates or his job in the City, and to whom nothing really matters. That is not how things are in the real world. Most Members of Parliament nowadays burn their bridges when they come here, setting aside their former professions, trades or jobs, and when they end their time in the House they often face an uncertain future. It is important to provide such people with a proper transition.

The hon. Member for Carlisle suggested that some of the winding-up funds should be used to pay for professional advice on employment opportunities. I think that a good employer would supply such funds not from a winding-up allowance, but as a matter of course. I think that the House should provide the largest amount that it can sensibly provide, not because I want Members of Parliament to have a particular advantage but because I want us to be in a similar position to someone leaving a major company. We have all seen major redundancies in our constituencies, and we have all urged employers—some of them good employers, some not so good—to provide relocation packages so that people can find new ways into work.

I entirely endorse what was said by the hon. Member for Carlisle, and entirely concur with what was said by the Leader of the House and the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May).

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I support the motion. My wife Virginia is either a member or a potential member of the association. I have enjoyed reading the newsletter, and think that the editor deserves praise.

I do not agree with some of what has been said, but the debate is relatively limited. I think that we should all be prepared to clear our offices when an election comes, and I do not think that we need too much time in which to do it. I do not like the idea that Members of Parliament are doing a job better than any other that they could do. I am glad that we are past the times when only the poor and the rich could become Members of Parliament, and that now middle-income groups can do so.

I agree with the general points made about the importance of the solidarity and support that people receive, but I think we should bear in mind the position of spouses or partners of former Members of Parliament, especially former Members who have died. I remember a case about 20 years ago, when someone who had been the daughter-in-law and wife of distinguished Members was not be recognised when she came back here several weeks after her husband's funeral and memorial service. Although they are not members of the association, I hope that some attention will be paid to those who have been married to politics for many years.

Mr. Martlew: I should make it clear that spouses can join the association.

Peter Bottomley: I am glad to hear that. I think it very appropriate.

I believe that the motion should be passed, and that we should have further discussions on what else can be done to ensure that people can be together and feel that they are contributing—if only to the fun of being in an association of former Members, but I think that they can contribute more.

1.35 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): I am sorry that I was missing for a few minutes. I was in touch with—not Joe Ashton, although he has been in touch with me a great deal lately, which is why I have risen to speak—but the cardiologist. Just at the moment, that is a bit more important.

Joe Ashton was a Whip between 1976 and 1979, when we had no majority. Well, we did have a majority, but then Stonehouse went missing. He was on a Florida beach, then he turned up in Australia. Then he crossed the Floor, and Joe Ashton was given the job of being one of the Whips keeping our majority intact. They were heady days and all the rest of it, but we formed a relationship. Joe's job was to try to get me into the Lobbies. It did not always work, but I told him all those years ago that I would do him a favour some time. I got on the phone to him when he retired. It has not been mentioned yet, but Joe had a very serious illness. We had many long discussions about how he was getting on. At the time I could see that despite the grim fight that he was undertaking, there was no doubt that the proposal that he had helped to put to the House way back in 2001—I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) said that it was on 2 May—was still very much in his mind. I promised him on numerous occasions that I would raise it if necessary, in accordance with what he wanted. What I did not know was that Joe had also been briefing my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, who has presented most of his propositions today.

Reference has been made to the composition of this place in the old days. Many Members then had formerly worked in factories or the pits. I can speak with some knowledge about pension entitlements in those days. The pension from the pits was only voluntary even in my day, and there was no pension at all when I started working as a miner. Many people who became Members of Parliament received no pension. It is true that they could have money shifted from one place to another, but people who had given 20 years' service were receiving about £100 a month—people who had worked in factories, pits and all the rest. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) was right to say that many Members did not leave with a great deal of money. It is true that the composition of this place has changed dramatically. There are no longer 700,000 miners; you would have a job to find more than 5,000. That is why it is important to remember what the position used to be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle mentioned nominees for the parliamentary contributory pension fund and the Members' fund. That is what Members are striving for, as of right. If the Commission would consider it, I am sure that my old pal Joe Ashton, Bill Michie and all the rest who helped to form the association will be very pleased. Help with the cost of the magazine would also be appreciated, and Joe also told me that he would like to have the names and addresses of all the Members who had left, so that they could keep in contact.

So those are the proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle dealt with them previously and explained precisely what was needed, and I hope that the Commission can deal with the matter. I have done my job. I made a promise to Joe donkeys' years ago that there would come an occasion when he would be glad of my presence. I may not be in the Lobby, but I am speaking up for his association.

1.40 pm

Mr. Straw: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to reply briefly to this debate. I am very grateful to all those who have expressed their support for the motion and this proposal; that will certainly help members of the House of Commons Commission to ensure better support for the association.

On the issue of pensioner trustees, raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), there is provision for one member of the trustees to be a "pensioner member", and they do not have to be a Member of this House. The current member, who was chosen last year, is Lord Naseby. He is better known to Members of this House as Michael Morris, and was MP for one of the Northampton seats for many years. I undertake to discuss with the association and the trustees whether there should be a nominee from the association, as of right, on the Board of Trustees.

With that, I urge support for the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the formation of the Association of Former Members of Parliament in response to the Resolution of the House of 2nd May 2001; notes that it now has a membership of over 330 former Members; acknowledges the work done by the Association and its Executive Committee; and welcomes the financial and other assistance accorded to the Association by the House of Commons Commission.

British Nuclear Group

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

1.41 pm

Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured this debate today on a subject of pivotal importance to my constituency. In fact, although it is of real importance to a number of constituencies throughout the country, nowhere will the effect of the sale of British Nuclear Group be more acutely felt than in Copeland and in West Cumbria generally.

I want to begin by establishing the unique importance of British Nuclear Group to the Sellafield site, Copeland and West Cumbria. I know that the Minister is well aware of these issues, but they bear repeating. British Nuclear Group is by far the largest company operating on the Sellafield site. It employs more than 7,000 people directly, and the site itself employs over 11,500 people. Employment at Sellafield sustains another 5,000 jobs in the wider local community, so in real terms the site is responsible for approximately 17,000 jobs. Such employment accounts for the majority of the West Cumbria economy and well over 60 per cent. of the economy of Copeland.

Take-home wages from the Sellafield site are in excess of £210 million per year. The site provides, as the Minister knows, high quality, highly skilled, highly valued jobs. Expenditure from the Sellafield site going into the regional supply chain is in excess of £600 million a year. It provides the lifeblood of the local service industry companies, the hospitality and retail industries, and the bespoke, high-value engineering industries to be found not only in Copeland, but in Allerdale, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham). Local supply chain procurement by BNG is essential in West Cumbria, an issue to which I shall return.

In addition to that contribution to the local economy, in the past 15 years BNG has committed £20 million to the West Cumbria Development Fund—a local economic regeneration body—which, in turn, has helped to lever in a further £10 million worth of European Union funding. BNG has also demonstrated a concerted willingness to work in partnership with the local communities within which it operates, and, crucially, with the trade unions. In my view, it is the trade union members on any nuclear site who are the ultimate arbiters of safety. That is certainly the case at Sellafield, and I am grateful and pleased that the relationship between them and BNG is as strong as it clearly is. It is against that background that my interest in BNG must be understood. I must also state for the record that I am a former employee of the company at the Sellafield site—a fact of which I am extremely proud.

On 30 March, the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced the Government's endorsement of the proposal of the board of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. to sell BNG. This was expected, and given the remit of the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority under the terms of the Energy Act 2004, completely understandable. The NDA and the UK as a whole require the development of competition within the nuclear decommissioning industry in the UK, in order to achieve the best value for money for the taxpayer. Although I completely accept the logic of that and the need for competition, I hope that the Minister can explain what, if any, consideration was given to the formation of a public-private partnership for UK decommissioning before the owner-contractor model was chosen.

Accompanying the Secretary of State's announcement, the NDA made the wise announcement that it would grant BNG a new five-year contract to operate the Sellafield site. That contract will keep the company, or its new owner, at the site until at least 2012. The Secretary of State said that he expects the sale of BNG to be completed by the autumn of 2007. For my constituents, that means that, from next autumn, there will be a new, dominant company operating the Sellafield site. It is essential that, that new company understand my community and become an active partner within it.

I have to say at this juncture that neither the Leader of the Opposition nor the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have shown the faintest glimmer of an understanding of what any of this means. Following the Secretary of State's announcement in March, the shadow Secretary of State issued a press release claiming that that announcement meant that the nation's nuclear liabilities were being put into the private sector. I can only assume that he has not read, let alone understood, the 2004 Act. Those liabilities have remained, and will remain, within the public sector under the ownership of the NDA. That embarrassing lack of understanding does not bode well for the shadow Secretary of State's time on the Conservative Front Bench, or, indeed, for the Conservatives' approach to the nuclear industry in general.

The Leader of the Opposition recently hand-picked one of the country's most vocal and misleading opponents of the nuclear industry to be his energy and environment adviser. That adviser has repeatedly misled the nation about the health and well-being of my constituents, among whom he has spread fear, anxiety and anger. His claims have no scientific or factual basis and constitute little more than malicious scaremongering. So today, I call upon the Leader of the Opposition—sadly, he is not here—to ensure that his high-profile advisers publicly withdraw their comments, or to otherwise sack them.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with me that, where nuclear power stations do exist, local communities have come to accept them and value the contribution that they make to such communities, and to the wider generation of electricity throughout the country?

Mr. Reed: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that contribution. He is absolutely correct; indeed, I could not have put it better myself. Speaking as a member of a local community surrounding a nuclear facility, I can say that that is precisely what such communities believe.

I return to the litany of errors committed by Opposition Front Benchers. Only this week, the new Leader of the Opposition notably failed to back calls for a new programme of nuclear power generation in Britain. I deeply regret his turning his back on the industry at its time not only of greatest need, but of greatest opportunity. More importantly, at a time when climate change has emerged as perhaps the definitive political challenge of our time, it is a tragedy that Conservative Front Benchers should fail to back the single largest carbon dioxide-free producer of energy—energy that is available not only to Britain, but the world. I implore the Leader of the Opposition to reconsider, and I will happily sit down with him and his shadow Secretary of State—and, indeed, the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker)—and convince them of the nuclear case. This issue is above and beyond party politics. I hope that all parties in the House will be able and mature enough to devise a national consensus on energy policy, and I urge the Conservatives to join me in calling for new nuclear power generation in the UK.

Last week, during a trip to the USA, I visited the Hanford nuclear facility in Washington state before meeting representatives of the Hanford area on Capitol Hill. I learned a lot from that visit, and it is appropriate to compare and contrast the British and American approaches to the nuclear industry. It is important to do so because there are significant differences between the two. Let me make it clear at the outset that I am a passionate pro-American, but that cannot and will not influence my views on what I believe to be right for the Sellafield site and my community.

It is important to understand and be aware of the US nuclear regulatory framework and working practices, because a US-based company is almost certainly going to buy BNG. There may or may not be some involvement from French interests, and a number of consortiums might attempt a purchase. Should a consortium bid for, and succeed in buying, BNG, I could not support the break-up or carve-up of the Sellafield site. That has been done before—notably by BNFL during the 1990s—and it resulted in a deterioration in working practices and managerial accountability structures. Such an approach also compromised safety, so I would need to be convinced that it is now workable. At this stage, I have seen nothing to convince me that it is, and I firmly believe that the Sellafield site is best served by one operator.

In the event of the successful purchase of BNG by a US-based company, I would expect that company immediately and wholeheartedly to embrace the British nuclear industry's working and regulatory practices, and to adopt the British corporate social responsibility culture. That means the adoption of a local supply chain purchasing policy, a close and productive relationship with the trade unions, the establishment and implementation of significant socio-economic development plans for the areas in which it operates, and an effective and satisfactory approach to working terms and conditions—including already amassed pension entitlements—that is acceptable to the existing work force. Fundamentally, it means doing things our way. Above all, it means working safely. The safety of the Sellafield work force and the safety of my community is non-negotiable, whatever other inducements might be proposed.

The British nuclear work force is the best nuclear work force in the world. I can say that with confidence as I have up close and personal experience of it. Standards of safety in the UK industry are better than elsewhere in the world, technological development and applied scientific and research application is among the best in the world, and productivity standards are now approaching the best there are as well. It is those attributes that make our nuclear workers, our nuclear scientists, our nuclear engineers and our nuclear working practices among the most sought after in the world.

Speak to any US multinational with a developing interest in buying BNG—and I have spoken to some—and they will explain that an association with the British nuclear industry is the key to opening up the vast nuclear clean-up and decommissioning markets in Russia, former Soviet Union states and eastern Europe. BNG's recent record illustrates that, as the company has successfully decommissioned and cleaned up more than 50 redundant nuclear facilities world wide. The company is also on a sound financial footing, with signs of real further improvements in financial performance this year and in years to come.

The company's profitability has not been achieved at the expense of either productivity or safety, a feat attributable not only to management, but the knowledge and experience of the shop floor. Last year, Sellafield's vitrification plant delivered a record-breaking 503 canisters against a predicted target of 450. By contrast, the US vitrification programme is billions of dollars over budget and in complete disarray. The Sellafield MOX plant recently delivered a second batch of four MOX fuel assemblies to NOK—Nordostschweizerische Kraftwerke AG—in time for its summer reactor reload, and last week signed a new £200 million-plus contract with another continental utility. Those are causes for celebration.

In January 2006, the company completed the clean-up of historic liquid waste from one of the oldest plants at Sellafield, preventing more than 44 years of liquid emissions and saving the taxpayer up to £300 million in potential new building costs. Only last week, I was discussing problematic clean-up issues with the US Department of Energy. It highlighted a particular problem in the US with technetium. That is an issue solved by BNG some time ago—I am delighted to say that I was involved in the project—which piqued a great deal of interest among the US Department of Energy officials. If anyone from BNG is listening to this debate or reads the report, I advise them to get down to the patent office as soon as possible, because a significant sum could be made from their unique technological skills and expertise. The market applications are huge.

With regard to safety—we should bear in mind the fact that Sellafield is the largest construction site in Britain and one of the largest in Europe—the current days-away case record rate is 0.23 against a target of 0.28, which is lower than any similar rate among any US contractors currently operating in that country. BNG Project Services has a days-away case record rate of zero and has worked almost 3 million man hours without a single lost-time accident. I could go on, but the point is made. The British nuclear industry places safety above everything else and it is a matter of fact that foreign contractors will have to emulate that safety culture if they want to operate in Britain. We lead the world in that regard and others have a great deal to learn from us.

I cannot guess at the value of BNG in financial terms. However, when assessing the revenue of any potential sale, I ask that the Government consider more than the financial value of the sale. Value is measured in more than money and the highest bidder for BNG may not necessarily be the best bidder for my community. It is imperative that the highest financial bid should not bring with it the highest actual cost to my constituents or any part of the UK in the areas of safety, environmental performance and socio-economic investment and development. Public acceptability of a particular contractor must be considered in the process of any sale, and weight must be given to that in devising the criteria against which potential BNG purchasers are judged.

It must be said, one year after the establishment of the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority, that its presence in my constituency and West Cumbria generally has been enthusiastically received. It has proven already to be a genuinely involved, listening community partner, which has already demonstrated that it has the interests of the West Cumbria community uppermost in its thoughts and actions.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the budgeting process of the NDA. I was concerned to discover in the US that the budget for nuclear clean-up is done on a year-by-year basis, so the budgets are set annually. They are therefore subject to the vagaries of the political process—cut in some years and expanded in others. In the UK, my hon. Friend and the Department have provided a comprehensive, stable framework for nuclear decommissioning and clean-up to take place, and I am grateful for that.

I understand that the NDA will devise the BNG sale criteria, no doubt in conjunction with BNG, BNFL and the DTI. What I now require is significant involvement from the West Cumbrian community in determining what those criteria should be. The socio-economic obligations for both the NDA and its contractors are laid out in the Energy Act 2004, and I now hope to explore with the aforementioned groups the United States National Defence Authorisation Act 1993, especially section 3161, which helps to define the socio-economic obligations of US contractors operating in nuclear decommissioning environments. My hon. Friend will know of the importance of the West Cumbria Strategic Forum and I believe that it would be appropriate if that body were involved in establishing the sale criteria.

Finally, the future of British Nuclear Group is of fundamental importance to West Cumbria. It is vital that its sale be conducted properly, transparently and with the interests of those communities where BNG currently operates upheld at the centre of this process. The successful bidder must be the one who understands the ambitions and aspirations of its host communities and the working practices of the UK nuclear industry. I thank my hon. Friend for his patience and time, and look forward to his response.

1.56 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate, despite being late, and I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Reed) for missing the first few minutes of his speech. I was taken by surprise, but I should have learned that about this place.

I wish to make three quick points. I represent a constituency at the other scale of things from my hon. Friend, in as much as the Berkeley site has been undergoing a fairly organised run-down for some months. The decision to dispense with the nuclear laboratories came as a bit of a shock, but it is pleasing to see that the work will go on. I welcomed the comments by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday. In defending the nuclear industry, I have always sought to make the point that it is nothing if it is not its work force. That is the basic integrity of the industry. One can have sites and systems, but without the people, one has no industry. It is vital that we keep those people in place.

So my first point is that it is vital that we keep the presence of the industry in many different parts of the country. That is why I have always fought for Berkeley to be considered, if not as the site of a new nuclear power station—because of problems with the River Severn—but to retain the research and development facilities. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about that.

Secondly, we have the issue of the ownership of the sites by the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority. Much as I can see the benefits of separating the providers of services from the ownership of the sites, there are some concerns about possible conflicts of interest. Given that Berkeley is the first decommissioned nuclear power station in this country, a proposal is imminent for the further decommissioning of the old power site, which would be a first in the world. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept an invitation when the proposal is introduced to come and see how it would take the nuclear industry forward, in terms of solving the waste problem and the issue of the new generation.

My third point is about the relationship of the BNG, whatever form it takes, and other parts of the nuclear industry. It is vital that we do not see contractualisation as the answer to everything. I am concerned that we have no overall picture of what the nuclear industry could look like in five years' time. British Energy, BNFL, AMEC and the various other parts of the industry may have had their weaknesses, and the introduction of foreign investors may or may not be a good thing, but there needs to be clarity about the industry's structure. Without that, we will not be able to build the new generation of nuclear power stations, even if that is what we decide to do.

Finally, I totally concur with my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland that BNG is an important company that has been much abused in the past. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give us some food for thought, and hope for the future.

2 pm

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): After the previous debate on MPs' pay, it is good to turn to the calmer and less controversial waters of nuclear energy.

I welcome the opportunity to comment on the future of the British Nuclear Group. My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Reed) is a great commentator on nuclear policy, and his expertise and experience are always worth listening to. In addition, he has a great reputation in his community, as I witnessed when I visited Sellafield some months ago.

The former Secretary of State, who is now Secretary of State for Education and Skills, announced our intentions in a written statement to the House on 30 March. That statement made it clear that we had approved the BNFL board's recommendation that it should sell BNG through a competitive sale process commencing in April 2007 or earlier. However, there has been much media speculation about how the competitive sale will be conducted. Some of that speculation has been accurate and some of it less so, and my aim today is to provide some clarity on the matter.

I recognise that this debate takes place against a backdrop of some interest in the future of nuclear energy. I shall not say too much about that wider issue, save that I am conducting an energy review on behalf of my Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, and that it will report on these critical questions by the summer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland rightly made some very positive comments about BNG and the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority's achievements since it commenced operations just over a year ago. I should like to echo those sentiments. BNFL did an admirable job in restructuring itself and preparing the ground for the NDA. The management and staff at BNG have coped very well with the transition. I am tremendously encouraged that the NDA's stewardship of the UK's nuclear clean-up has already yielded significant efficiency savings at BNG's sites. It is a very good start, but of course we are looking for very much more.

That is why we believe that a competitive sale is the right route. After careful deliberation, the BNFL board determined a sale to be in the company's best commercial interest and to represent BNG's best chance of operating successfully in the commercial market created by the Energy Act 2004, thereby providing long-term stability for staff. Most important of all, though, the company also convinced us that it would be good for the taxpayer because it is good for the nuclear decommissioning and clean-up programme.

I shall be happy to discuss with my hon. Friend the reason why the option of a public-private partnership was not pursued, but essentially it was because BNG would not have the required critical mass.

The decision for Government was not straightforward, and was taken only after extensive consultation with key stakeholders. We were especially keen that the sale should not impact negatively on the NDA's mission, and we have moved forward carefully to ensure that we have fully considered the issues. However, I am absolutely confident that we now have the right result, and one that will contribute to improved clean-up performance for the NDA by introducing external expertise more quickly.

The NDA's competition timetable reflects its broader strategy to prioritise the tackling of the highest hazards. Rather than run its own separate competition for Sellafield, the NDA was able to accommodate the sale by letting a new five-year contract for that site. That will commence next year, at the point when the new owner acquires BNG. The NDA and BNFL will thus work closely throughout the competitive sale process. The aim will be to ensure that the successful bidder is the best available to improve performance substantially, particularly at Sellafield. Therefore, the selection criteria will be focused mainly on issues such as safety, reducing high hazards, driving down costs through better planning and more innovation, accelerating clean-up and improved managed capability.

This debate is not the occasion to discuss the problems involved in nuclear decommissioning, but it is worth noting that they represent some of the really big challenges facing this country in the coming half century. Over the summer, the expert group CORUM will present a report with proposals on what might be called the final resting place for nuclear waste. Those are critical issues.

Mr. Drew: Does my hon. Friend agree that decommissioning represents a global rather than a purely national challenge? Increasingly, global relationships will have an impact on the nuclear industry. We have expertise in some areas, but will also have to borrow expertise from other parts of the world. Likewise, other countries will want our expertise in decommissioning.

Malcolm Wicks: I agree with my hon. Friend. The BNG sale enables us to assess the best bidders and to draw on their expertise, but he is right that Britain has great skills when it comes to nuclear energy. Indeed, we are very good at energy as a whole and we need to seize the chance to become one of the leading countries in nuclear power.

In assessing bids for BNG, the main emphasis will be on achieving value by making sustainable clean-up improvements in the longer term. We will keep in mind the fact that a sustained 10 per cent. efficiency improvement equates to a £200 million saving on the NDA's annual budget, which can be ploughed straight back into more work. Clearly, however, there is still some way to go and it is much too early to speculate about the commercial basis on which BNFL, working with the NDA, will organise the sale process.

It is expected that the competitive sale process will start in April 2007 with completion up to six months later. Details will be updated on the NDA and BNFL websites, but it is currently expected that pre-qualification will occur at the end of the summer. Before the new year, the new draft contract will be shared with pre-qualified bidders, the regulators and other stakeholders on a fully open and transparent basis.

The sale will comprise BNG and all its subsidiaries on an integrated basis: project services, Magnox and spent fuel services will all be included. Following a successful exit from its legacy contracts, BNG America, the US clean-up subsidiary, has already been sold with no continuing liabilities. Magnox has been included on the understanding that its inclusion does not disrupt the Magnox competitions due to start in 2008, or possibly 2009. Given the short time gap between completion of the sale and the start of the competitions, the new owner of BNG will not be expected to make significant changes to the running of the Magnox stations during that period.

BNFL and the NDA have been maintaining a close dialogue with the unions and staff over proposals for BNG and that will continue, with the involvement of the Department as appropriate. I recognise that such fundamental change creates tremendous uncertainty for the work force, so I use this opportunity to reaffirm unequivocally that any BNFL employee whose employment is transferred to a private sector employer will receive the relevant pensions protections set out in the Energy Act 2004; or, where they do not apply, in the Cabinet Office statement of practice for staff transfers in the public sector.

The sale of BNG is entirely consistent with the BNFL strategy review held in 2003, which concluded that UK clean-up should be BNFL's priority. It envisaged that BNG would need to find partners to operate successfully in the new market being created by the NDA. The review also concluded that other parts of BNFL should be run for value and to minimise risk to the UK taxpayer. The sale of Westinghouse has already been announced. In addition, we are considering the future of BNFL's research and development arm, Nexia Solutions, and BNFL is exploring ways of realising value from its shareholding in Urenco.

Mr. Jamie Reed: An important issue came up in my broad-ranging discussions in the US last week with Ron Ault from the AFL-CIO—the US equivalent to the TUC—when we were talking about companies that might have an interest in BNG and which could have a direct impact on the lives of people in my community and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Workington (Tony Cunningham). Mr. Ault said of one company that it would rather climb a tree than do a deal with labour—meaning the unions—and that, at any cost, it would pick a fight with the trade union movement at whichever site it was asked to operate. I shall not name the company, save to say that it has run into terrible difficulties at the Hanford vitrification plant. What is my hon. Friend the Minister's view on the relationship that American companies must have with UK working practices and UK working bodies and representatives on UK nuclear sites?

Malcolm Wicks: I have already paid tribute to the skills of our work force in the nuclear industry. Those skills need to be safeguarded and we need to think about the future when, as with other parts of the energy sector—oil and gas—demographic trends mean that the average age of workers is increasing. We need to attract new people to those industries. It is critically important that whoever takes over BNG has a proper understanding of what these days we call the human relations side of business. I should rather climb a tree myself than jeopardise those important relationships. In any case, such companies would have to contend with my hon. Friend, which would be a formidable challenge.

I hope I have provided clarity on the issues surrounding the BNG sale and the rationale for approving the board's decision. In summary, the Government have been persuaded that it is good for the company, its people, the NDA, decommissioning and, ultimately, the taxpayer. I thank my hon. Friend and other colleagues for their contributions to this short, early, but useful, debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Iraq

1. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Basra. [72194]

6. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the security situation in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [72200]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): I am sure that the whole House will join me in sending condolences to the families of Private Joseva Lewaicei and Private Adam Morris, who were killed on Saturday 13 May north of Basra city. Our thoughts are also with the soldier injured in that incident, with the two soldiers who were injured in the incident at the weekend in Basra, and with their families.

Although insurgents continue to pursue a policy of violence and intimidation with the aim of disrupting the political process in Iraq, the majority of attacks are confined to four of the 18 provinces. However, their efforts have not precluded the formation of a new Government of national unity in Iraq. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said this morning, that is a huge step forward which deserves international support. In Basra, and across Multi-National Division (South-East), despite recent tragic events the security situation remains relatively calm.

David Taylor: As my right hon. Friend said, Adam Morris, a 19-year-old soldier from Hugglescote in north-west Leicestershire, was killed by a roadside bomb near Basra nine days ago along with a colleague from the Royal Anglian Regiment as they travelled in a Land Rover protected only by composite fibreglass. As well as extending deep condolences to Adam's family and friends, the House will endorse the Leicester Mercury letter-writing campaign to boost the regiment's morale. Does the Secretary of State agree that a large majority in both the United Kingdom and Iraq want an early withdrawal of foreign troops? Does he think that partition is necessary to prevent the country from descending further into an anarchistic hell-hole?

Des Browne: May I first commend my hon. Friend for his support not only for his constituent's family, but for the Royal Anglian Regiment? I met members of the regiment in Basra last week, and I can reassure him, his constituents and, indeed, his local newspaper, that the morale of those soldiers was very high. In my short time in this job I have been struck by how often our forces meet our expectation, whatever adversity they face, that they will maintain the highest standards not only of morale but of discipline, application and duty. On the meat of his question, it is of course our ambition and intention to remove our troops from Iraq, but we shall do so in the proper context, which has been set out on numerous occasions at the Dispatch Box and involves the nature of the threat, the capacity of Iraqi forces to provide security for their own people, the capacity of their Government both at national and provincial level to govern, and our own ability to respond to support the Iraqi Government's ambitions. I can say no more than that in support of our position in Iraq.

Andrew Selous: Does the Ministry of Defence believe that the missile that downed our Lynx in Basra on 6 May was sold by Russia to Iran, and has the Army asked for any extra resources to deal with the current attacks against it?

Des Browne: The hon. Gentleman will know—I made my position clear in my statement to the House after the Lynx helicopter crash—that I will not speculate on any aspect of that crash, as a board of inquiry and an investigation are under way. Given the nature of that investigation, it would not be helpful to speculate at the Dispatch Box about the way in which the helicopter was brought down until it is concluded. That is my position, and it would not be helpful to be drawn into further speculation.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, whatever views one took about the original invasion, there should be total condemnation of the so-called insurgents who carry out, day after day, the most horrifying crimes against the Iraqi people? Should not the newly elected Government in Iraq accept the fact that our troops cannot remain there indefinitely? They should concentrate on the task before them, bearing in mind, as I have said, the fact that there will come a time when our troops must leave?

Des Browne: My hon. Friend would do well to reflect on the words of the new Prime Minister of Iraq, who spelled out clearly the priorities of his Government for the economy, security, militia and the provision of governance, at both national and provincial level, for the people of Iraq. It is politics that will resolve the issues that face the people of Iraq. My hon. Friend is right that whatever the motives of those who seek to use violence—whether they are insurgents or, as I was advised in the south-east, those who, in the absence of a central Government, are positioning themselves economically or politically to take advantage of that situation—there is now a Government of national unity in Iraq, and in the words of others who have spoken on that today, there is no reason now for those insurgencies to continue. The destiny of the people of Iraq is in their own hands. We are all working towards a situation where, in terms of security and governance, the Iraqi Government will be able to look after their own people and there will be no need for the continued support of multinational forces. Until that time comes, we have a duty to continue to support that Government.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman will have heard the Prime Minister's words this morning about an exit strategy for our troops in Iraq. Can he give the House some detail—for instance, about the length of time it might take for our troops to finish training the Iraqi security forces, so that they can then be brought home?

Des Browne: When I visited Maysan province and in particular Camp Sparrowhawk last week, I was struck by the level of competence of the 4th brigade of the 10th division of the Iraqi army. That is my only personal experience of their competence, ability and determination to take command of the security situation, but even that observation was informed by other, more experienced military people who were in my company, who were able to point out to me what I ought to be looking for in relation to that competence. I am not able at this stage to say when those forces—army and police—will be capable of looking after their own security, but very experienced military personnel who serve in our forces in the south-east of Iraq tell me that they have made significant progress towards that objective over the past year or so. They also tell me that in three out of the four provinces for which we have responsibility in south-east Iraq, progress in governance and security is well advanced.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): May I take the Secretary of State back to the carefully crafted reply that he gave a few moments ago to the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) about the inquiry that is to be held into the loss of our troops as a result of a missile? Will he assure the House that the inquiry will cover the source of that missile, rather than just the incident itself? That is what I felt the Minister—unintentionally, of course—tried to avoid. We want an assurance that if intelligence and information are available they will be disclosed at the inquiry and subsequently made public, and that the inquiry's remit will cover that.

Des Browne: I did not seek even to confirm in the House that the helicopter had been brought down by a missile. If anything I said may have inadvertently led people to believe that I was imparting that information to the House, I did so in error, but I do not believe that I did. As I told the House when I made my statement last Monday, when the investigation is concluded the board of inquiry report will be published, to the extent that it can be. Until then, I will not be drawn into any speculation on any aspect of the investigation. I, as the Secretary of State for Defence, do not direct the investigation. It is conducted according to a set of rules that apply and have applied for a significant time. It will be conducted independently of any direction by Ministers, it will be conducted appropriately, and it will report on the issues that it thinks are relevant to the matters before it.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I associate the Opposition with the Secretary of State's condolences to the families of those who lost their lives on active service in Iraq?

Does the Secretary of State accept that, time after time at the Dispatch Box, his predecessor stated that it would be absolute folly to say anything about timetables for withdrawal other than when the job is done? Does he endorse that sentiment, and, if so, will he use his best endeavours in the Cabinet to put an end to the stream of articles and leaks that imply that withdrawal is on the cards, so that the Prime Minister can leave a legacy as a peacemaker? We do not want the Prime Minister to leave a legacy as a lethal version of the grand old duke of York.

Des Browne: When history considers the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to conflict resolution in a number of theatres around the world, it will significantly record that he has made a major contribution to peace in a number of parts of the world. I am not aware of any leaking of articles or briefing about a timetable. What I have sought to do, as indeed did my predecessor, is to give some clarity to the conditions that will need to be fulfilled before it will be appropriate for our forces to withdraw, first part of the way, and then fully, from Iraq. Like my predecessor, I have sought not to put a timetable on that, because I do not think that that would be in the interests of either the people of Iraq or the security of our own forces who are serving in Iraq, often in dangerous circumstances.

I fully agree that there needs to be some clarity in the description of the process, and I think that that is clear and that most people understand what the conditions need to be, but it is appropriate, when there is progress along that direction of travel, for that to be reported to the House. During my visit to Iraq, those whom we charge with the responsibility of making such assessments on the ground indicated that in a substantial part of Iraq for which we have responsibility, significant progress has been made.

Defence Sector (West Midlands)

2. David Wright (Telford) (Lab): If he will estimate the number of defence sector jobs in the west midlands region. [72196]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence employs some 5,600 military and some 6,000 civilian staff in the west midlands. It is estimated that a further 6,500 people are directly employed in defence-related industries in the region.

David Wright: Will my right hon. Friend join me in thanking the people of Shropshire for the outstanding service that they have given to the Ministry of Defence during the past few decades? Does he agree that we have an opportunity to develop a defence employment hub in Shropshire, with the retention of jobs at Sapphire House in Telford, the expansion of jobs at Donnington in The Wrekin and the awarding of the defence training review to Cosford?

Mr. Ingram: As well as paying tribute to the people of Shropshire, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who has been fully determined in pursuing a range of issues, some of which have played to his advantage, although not completely in the way that he sought. He listed a range of events. If on assessment they remain or are built on, that will be good news. If we have to make a decision that, in the interests of defence, we co-locate headquarters or rationalise to ensure that we make best use of resources, I am sorry but I will have to give him bad news—but I will do that when I make my decision.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Given the skills, dedication and commitment of Defence Logistics Organisation workers in Shropshire and the potential co-location to the south-west, is it not incumbent on the Ministry of Defence to have an open, transparent and fair consultation process? If so, why has the Ministry already purchased the building in Bristol that is being investigated by the Auditor General?

Mr. Ingram: Just because it is being investigated does not mean that it is wrong, and the hon. Gentleman should not prejudge. As has been explained before, the property was purchased as a piece of developmental work, looking at possibilities for the co-location of headquarters. Had we delayed purchasing the property when we had the opportunity to do so and then decided to so co-locate, it would have cost us more money. This is a judicious piece of positioning. It does not mean that that will be the final conclusion. I take exception to the hon. Gentleman's approach on openness and transparency. I have met him and others, and I will continue to do so. We operate openly and transparently in arriving at decisions and explain them afterwards in consultation with the trade unions and staff interests. I am sorry that he takes a different view, but I would not have thought that that was based on his experience.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): It is not only west midlands defence sector jobs but aerospace engineering and training excellence that make the case for locating the defence training contract at Cosford so strong. The region's universities are intrinsically involved in Cosford's work, and there are fantastic transport links, including the M54 and a direct rail service. I invite the Minister to visit the west midlands to see at first hand the fantastic opportunities that Cosford offers the MOD.

Mr. Ingram: I have visited Cosford and I am only too well aware of the situation. My hon. Friend knows that the matter is being judged on what is best for defence and for the defence training review. It so happens that I am not the Minister who is directly responsible for the matter, although I have an interest in the outputs. However, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson), has heard what my hon. Friend has said, and he will take it into account.

Heavy Lift Capability

3. Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): If he will make a statement on the heavy lift capability of the Royal Air Force. [72197]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The heavy lift capability of the Royal Air Force is provided by the C-17, and both the TriStar and the VC10 offer some lift capability as a secondary role. We keep our airlift capability under review to ensure that we have access to sufficient capacity to support operations.

Mr. Goodwill: If, as expected, Ministers decide to take our ageing, slow and vulnerable fleet of Sea King helicopters out of mothballs—many of those aircraft are as much as 35 years old—to ferry our brave lads and lasses around Iraq and Afghanistan, can we also expect to see Ministers being ferried around Whitehall in Austin Allegros and Ford Cortinas?

Mr. Ingram: I will not dignify the hon. Gentleman's question with a response, given the subject matter. He is asking about rotary lift, which has nothing to do with heavy lift. We plan to hold a competition to find a new medium-lift helicopter to meet our medium-term needs, and it will proceed in due course. In the meantime, we must examine our capacity and capabilities on rotary lift, and we are considering whether Puma and Sea King helicopters can be modified or refurbished for short-term use. We are also exploring how we can get more out of existing Merlin and Chinook helicopters and the feasibility of leasing aircraft. We are aware of the issues that must be addressed: there may well be a short-term solution, but there will be medium-term and long-term solutions, too, which means significant investment in our air capacity in this country.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): The Minister will be aware of last week's successful flight over London and into Heathrow by the A380 Airbus, which is powered by Rolls-Royce aero-engines. Has that made it more relevant that there will be a military version of that aircraft powered by those engines?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend knows that we have leased four C-17s, and we want to buy out that lease and to purchase another C-17. The A400M is the new generation of heavy lift, and it is due to enter service in 2012. It has been long awaited, and I have no doubt that when it comes into service it will prove to be a very capable aircraft. No doubt my hon. Friend hopes that it will have Rolls-Royce engines—if that is not the case, I will look forward to receiving further representations on the matter.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): By world standards, the Royal Air Force has no heavy lift capability. Our four C-17s—there are soon to be five—are incapable of sustaining one brigade deployed overseas. When will the RAF get a genuine heavy lift capability?

Mr. Ingram: The C-17s were intended to plug a gap arising from a previous procurement hiatus with the A400M, when we realised that we needed that heavy lift capability. The A400M has been long awaited. I will not remind the hon. Gentleman of when it was first procured, nor do we necessarily need to rehearse the delays associated with it under previous Administrations. Let me just say that we identified the shortfall. We have leased four C-17s, which we will buy out, and we are looking to purchase another one. We await the 25 A400Ms for which we are under contract.

Iraq

4. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the role of British troops in supporting the development and training of Iraqi security forces. [72198]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): I can confirm that British troops continue to make progress with the training and development of the Iraqi security forces in Multi-National Division (South-East). We have a number of initiatives under way, all of which are designed to enable the Iraqis progressively to take on responsibility for their own security—for example, by training the Iraqi police service and training and sustaining the 10th division of the Iraqi army.

Derek Wyatt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. Is he in a position to comment on the bravery of the Iraqi security guards in helping when our Lynx helicopter was shot down 16 days ago? My real question is this: when we have left, what will be the long-term legacy with the Iraqi security forces? Will they be allowed to come to Sandhurst, will we have intelligence sharing with the Met police, and so on?

Des Browne: My hon. Friend is right to point out—as does General Cooper, who commands our forces in south-east Iraq—the contribution that the Iraqi security forces and police made to the calming of the situation after the Lynx crash. There had been other evidence of the improving capability of the Iraqi forces in their contribution to the referendum and to the security of the general election in December last year. From our point of view as a Government, we will continue to offer the Iraqi Government support on a bilateral basis, but it will of course be for them to decide what continuing relationship they want with us. As they have only today formed the first democratically elected Government, it might be a bit premature for me to describe from the Dispatch Box what our continuing relationship with them will be.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): What assessment has been made of the extent of militia infiltration of the Iraqi security forces and police, and what is being done to deal with that? Does the Minister believe that a programme, along the lines of those which worked successfully in the Balkans, of disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration, would be the logical next step in Iraq?

Des Browne: My understanding is that the new Iraqi Government include just such a project—as well as a general proposal to deal with militia—in the description of security priorities. Part of the programme that they describe concerns the demobilisation, disarmament and integration of militia into the security forces of Iraq. That process must be dealt with very carefully, ensuring that one does not integrate into those forces elements that one would want to eradicate.

The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that the Iraqi police force and, to a lesser extent, the Iraqi army, had been infiltrated by forces that were there for, shall I say, less than benign purposes—in fact, quite malevolent purposes. The capacity to deal with that in the area for which we have responsibility had for some months been impeded by the lack of a proper relationship with the provincial council in the south-east. Ironically, the process of re-engagement came to fruition the day after the horrific crash of the Lynx helicopter. Last week, I was able to see and hear from our commander on the ground in Iraq that that process is moving forward. Through that process, and by supporting the provincial Government and the chief of police in Basra, we will be able to deal with the problem that the hon. Gentleman identifies.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I have seen first hand in Basra the work of British armed forces and police forces in training the Iraqi police and security services. Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the work that those individuals do, sometimes in very dangerous personal situations? Does he agree that that training is bearing fruit? My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) cited the example of the downing of the Lynx, where the Iraqi security services were able to take control of the situation very soon afterwards.

Des Browne: My hon. Friend speaks from some experience. Let me emphasise to hon. Members who have visited our forces in Iraq to see the position there that our troops on the ground greatly appreciate that. Sometimes they believe, for whatever reason, that their work and achievements are not fully appreciated in the United Kingdom, and it is helpful when parliamentarians take the time and trouble to go and see for themselves.

The capability of the Iraqi police force in particular has recently improved significantly. That is substantially down to those who have trained them. A significant representation of police officers from throughout the United Kingdom is involved in that, and I have no hesitation in paying tribute to their work. I rely on those people's assessment of the improvement in the Iraqi police force, and not on my observations, in reporting any improvement to the House.

Military Deployment (Afghanistan)

5. Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): If he will list the security tasks being undertaken by the UK armed forces in support of the Afghan Government. [72199]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): Our armed forces undertake a range of tasks in support of the Government of Afghanistan through the international security assistance force, the coalition and bilateral arrangements. Those are aimed at helping to create a secure and stable environment in which the rebuilding of the country can proceed.

Mr. Holloway: Why are our armed forces still planning to conduct joint police patrols when the police in Helmand province are wildly corrupt and, as yet, unreformed? To what extent is the Secretary of State encouraging President Karzai to use the detailed coalition intelligence material that we possess to support the prosecution of major drug traffickers with close political connections?

Des Browne: I say to the hon. Gentleman, who I know takes a significant interest in those matters, through not only his membership of the Defence Committee but his recent experiences of visiting Afghanistan, that I appreciate his informed interest. I reassure him that, in our communications with President Karzai, we encourage rooting out corruption, wherever it may be in the structures of the Government of Afghanistan. I have no personal experience of that, but the reports that I receive from my Cabinet colleagues who have met President Karzai are that he is a ready interlocutor on such matters.

The first part of the question was about patrolling with the Afghan police. Just as in Iraq, the process of our engagement with the Afghan police means that we can identify their training needs, improve their performance and help to root out the sort of behaviour that the hon. Gentleman identifies as unacceptable.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend send a clear message today from the Government to the Taliban, who watch and read European media, that NATO will not be a soft touch when it takes over from the Americans? Will he also send a message to our European colleagues to ensure that the rules of engagement that they allow their troops to use remain robust and that any attack on NATO forces will be met with strong resistance and retaliation?

Des Browne: I have every confidence in our NATO allies and their ability to carry out the tasks that they have accepted in the various parts of Afghanistan to which they have been deployed. I have enough concern about my responsibilities, without directing those who are responsible for delivering those tasks and in whom I have confidence.

However, I agree with the first part of my hon. Friend's question. A strong message is being conveyed, not only to the Taliban but to others who are engaged in violence in southern Afghanistan where deployment is taking place, that we will meet violence with a robust response when necessary to protect not only our troops but Afghan troops who are deployed in that area to deliver security to it.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The original parliamentary statement said that the Afghan deployment was to be for three years, at a cost of £1 billion. Now that Ministers and commanders are talking about being there for the long haul, what are the Government's working assumptions about the length of time and the cost involved?

Des Browne: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that in the Defence Select Committee's report on the supplementary estimates, a request was made for a breakdown of the £1 billion cost so as to give Parliament some information on how the money was being spent. In response to that request, the MOD produced such a breakdown. The hon. Gentleman will know, as I do from my previous job, that we make plans for public spending for three years at a time, at the most. I believe that the role of our troops in Afghanistan lies at the heart of his question, and there is significant clarity about that role. I also accept, however, that we will not be able to deliver the outcome that we hope to deliver within a time scale of three years.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The geography of Afghanistan dictates that helicopters will be absolutely essential to delivering secure outcomes on the ground. However, there have been rumours that the military have been asking for more helicopter support than has been made available. Will the Secretary of State comment on those rumours? Is he absolutely confident that the people on the ground in Afghanistan have the helicopter support that they need?

Des Browne: I have no intention of commenting on rumours. However, I can say to my hon. Friend that the deployment of our total resource—including troops on the ground, and attack and support helicopters—is based on the advice given to the MOD by people with experience of such troop deployment. I am satisfied, because they have told me specifically that they have the necessary resources to carry out the task in hand.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware of last night's attack on Panjwayi, a known Taliban stronghold. He will also be aware of the changing security situation in southern Afghanistan, where more than 200 rebels have reportedly been killed in the past two weeks during the fiercest fighting since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. The right hon. Gentleman's predecessor confirmed that our troops were engaged not in counter-terrorism but in counter-insurgency, where we may have to strike first. Are the Taliban considered to be terrorists or insurgents, for the purposes of our mission in Afghanistan?

Des Browne: I do not think that it assists the definition of our task to categorise a group of people in one way or another. The role of the international security assistance force in Afghanistan, particularly in regard to our deployment to the Helmand province, has often been stated. Indeed, its role and tasks are described on ISAF's website. In summary, we are there to support the provincial reconstruction team. Our focus will be on assisting the Afghan Government to create the security that provides the space for reconstruction. Clearly, the local environment is complex, as the hon. Gentleman's question suggests, with narcotics, criminality, the Taliban and tribal rivalries all present. The House should be in no doubt, however, that our forces have the capability and the freedom to do what is required to safeguard the reconstruction effort in that challenging environment. The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that there has been a recent increase in violence, but that response was to be expected from those insurgents and other elements in southern Afghanistan who wish to resist the deployment of ISAF troops to the area.

Dr. Fox: That answer will do nothing to dispel the fears that the mission in Afghanistan is less than clear. In a recent written answer, the Secretary of State's predecessor said that the "Taliban have been encouraging Afghan farmers to grow opium poppy and offering protection to farmers against eradication of their poppy crop."—[Official Report, 4 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 1812W.]

There is clearly a risk that the counter-narcotics measures taken in Afghanistan will push farmers into the arms of the Taliban, and that that would undermine the whole mission. Obviously, to avoid that, alternative incomes must be made available, and the cost of that is likely to increase as the destruction of poppy crops increases. Can the Secretary of State therefore explain why the Secretary of State for International Development has said of alternative livelihoods:

"The forecast spend for this year is in the region of £45 million and we hope to maintain similar levels of funding in future years."—[Official Report, 27 February 2006; Vol. 443, c. 53W.]

What implications does that statement have for the progress of counter-narcotics operations?

Des Browne: The answer is that those projects will be conducted differently in different places. Some of the projects will require significant investment at the outset to build the infrastructure required to enable local capacity to deliver such alternative livelihoods. I do not know the detail of the timeline of that expenditure, but £45 million will make a significant contribution towards offering alternative livelihoods to those engaged in the growing of poppies and other related activities. Of course, I should add that we are not the only people who are making contributions to fund alternative livelihoods in Afghanistan.

The suggestion at the heart of the hon. Gentleman's question is perfectly correct: unless those who are currently involved in poppy cultivation can be engaged in other activities that will provide a livelihood for them and their families, we will not be able to turn them away from that production. The focus of our forces in Helmand province is therefore clear: to create a security situation that will allow us to do just that.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): In spite of the courageous professionalism of our troops, the poppy crop in Afghanistan this year is likely to be at a record high. Are we not on a mission impossible that has already led to increased violence, will certainly drive farmers into the hands of the Taliban and could lead us into a British Vietnam? Surely a practical alternative would be to divert poppy crops into the manufacture of diamorphine, of which there is a world shortage.

Des Browne: That specific alternative was considered in detail and rejected by those who have experience in such areas. However, the development of democratic control of Afghanistan is at the heart of our mission, because that will prevent Afghanistan from ever again becoming a training ground for international terrorists. While we have had success in the northern and western parts of Afghanistan, the southern part poses a much greater challenge. At the heart of that challenge, of course, is our ability to retain the consent of the people of the south by providing them with practical examples of how proper governance, security and alternative livelihoods can offer a stable and better economic future. I believe that that is a noble cause, which deserves the support of both sides of the House. For as long as I have the responsibilities of Secretary of State for Defence, I will continue to support those troops whom we have asked to perform that role and those others whom we have asked to deliver reconstruction projects.

Far East Internees

7. Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): What progress has been made in finalising the settlements for second world war far east civilian internees. [72201]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom Watson): Officials have drafted detailed rules for the new 20-year residence criterion and held initial discussions on those with the chairman of the Association of British Civilian Internees of the Far East Region. Revised rules reflecting those discussions will be considered by the working group—which my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), announced on 28 March—at its meeting on 25 May. We aim to implement the new criterion as soon as possible.

Mr. Burrowes: I welcome the new Minister to his post. Will he provide an assurance to my constituent, Diana Elias, and other former far east civilian internees, that, by the time of the meeting with her next month, her compensation will be settled? Will the Government adopt in full the recommendations of the ombudsman in relation to this matter and ensure that they bring to an end this sorry chapter in their history?

Mr. Watson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. I am aware of the work that he has done in this respect through his contributions to the work of the Public Accounts Committee, and that he has a powerful constituency interest.

This week I shall meet Ron Bridge, chairman of the Association of British Civilian Internees of the Far East Region, and I hope to meet the chairman of the all-party group on far east prisoners of war and internees. I share the hon. Gentleman's sense of urgency, and hope that we can deal with the matter as swiftly as possible. I can tell him that according to the evidence I have seen, Mrs. Elias will be eligible for the ex gratia payment.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend to his position, and pay tribute to his predecessor, who took a very positive attitude to sorting out this difficult problem.

The scheme has been largely successful: a good many people have received compensation. However, one group has been excluded—unfairly, in the view of the all-party group. Is it not important for their needs to be recognised by means of an alteration that is not too complex, is easy to understand and provides a fall-back position for any hard cases that may still be excluded? We need a solution as quickly as possible. I am pleased that I shall be meeting my hon. Friend, I believe on Thursday, to try to work out some of the details.

Mr. Watson: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has said. He will be aware of the context of the problem to which he has referred: 25,000 people have already received ex gratia payments, and about 500 more will receive them if we extend eligibility. I am very keen to get the system right. I understand the pressures from the House for a result, but the devil is in the detail. I hope that we can resolve the problem, and that I can report back to the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): Let me take this first opportunity to welcome the Minister to his post. I look forward to jousting with him across the Dispatch Box.

When the Minister's predecessor made his statement about the 20-year rule on 28 March, he said that he would meet the working group immediately after the Easter recess and hoped to make a statement to the House a week or so later. We have been waiting for over a month now. Obviously there have been reshuffle-induced delays that may have been unavoidable, but can the Minister tell us when he will be in a position to outline the details of the 20-year rule? May I also pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), and ask whether he will ensure that each of the cases not resolved by the rule will be reviewed on its merits so that we can close this chapter once and for all?

Mr. Watson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. I shall be meeting the working group this week. I want to ensure that the matter is cleared up as quickly as possible, but I cannot give a date for an announcement until I have seen the details.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): I welcome the new Minister to his post. May I ask him to pay attention to the dossier? It is 10 years almost to the week since I first raised, in an Adjournment debate, the issue of the internees. I took a delegation to meet members of the then Conservative Government, and was utterly rebuffed, because the Conservative party never looks after the people who have served our country. It took a Labour Prime Minister—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Defence Industrial Strategy

8. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): What assessment he has made of the implications for defence research of the defence industrial strategy. [72202]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The defence industrial strategy clearly highlighted the importance of research and technology as a vital enabler of our national defence capability. As such, research and technology was embedded throughout the strategy. The chapter on "technology priorities to enable defence capability" draws together the critical underpinning and cross-cutting technologies that need to be sustained in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Dorries: The defence industrial strategy clearly stated that the technology advantage we enjoy today is the result of past investment, and warns that we are now in danger of falling behind our allies and even the emerging economies. Why, then, have the Government halved spending on research and development since 1997, cutting it from £900 million to £450 million?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Lady should go back to those who advised her, and find out when the curve started to go down. There were significant cuts in research and technology investment in the 1990s, under a Conservative Government.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Labour has been in office for nine years.

Mr. Ingram: Yes, we have been in office for nine years, and we have now established a defence industrial strategy. It must deal with some difficult timelines in, for instance, ensuring that research and technology are specific to defence needs and secure value for money and the desired outputs. It must also take account of the role of the innovative sector and of small and medium-sized enterprises, which would argue that they have been neglected for too long. There are some key core capabilities in that sector, which are sometimes bypassed. Those capabilities should be identified, and the barriers lifted.

The important point is that out of the criticism is now coming something of substance. Expenditure is being stabilised, and the plan is to raise it in line with inflation in the coming years. Meanwhile, a review will be undertaken—it will report at the end of the year—to see whether more needs to be done. So, although we may collectively have taken decisions that, overall, have not been to our benefit, we are addressing that issue, and the hon. Lady should thank this Government for doing so.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): The Minister is going on about the industrial strategy, but I should tell him that a hole has already been blown in it, thanks to our inability to produce bullets, artillery shells or bombs independently , as a result of the transfer of boxer caps and initiators to Germany, France and Switzerland. What message does he have for those loyal workers at Royal Ordnance who have lost their jobs?

Mr. Ingram: I sometimes wonder whether my hon. Friend ever reflects on the fact that Britain is also an exporting nation. Is he saying that those countries should not purchase our equipment or take on board some of our technologies? On munitions supply—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend knows some of the reasons why the factory closed. An industrial accident resulted in—[Interruption.] He knows the background. The company that owns that supply chain is looking at this issue very closely with the Ministry of Defence, to ensure that we get guaranteed supplies in those critical areas.

Mr. Hoyle: France, Germany and Switzerland.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend keeps on hectoring about Germany and other countries. They are our allies—does he want Britain to stand alone? Does he think that we should have no allies and not trade? That would not help this country at all.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: It is extraordinary that, at a time of unprecedented military activity, the Minister comes to the Dispatch Box to accept that under this Government, essential expenditure on R and D has halved. In addition, he will know that the head of the European Defence Agency has called for 20 per cent. of the EU nations' defence research spending to be spent collectively. How much of the UK's already reduced research budget does the MOD intend to spend in this way? Who will own the resulting intellectual property? Will this move not endanger our relationship with the United States? Will it not serve, moreover, to undermine a key principle of the defence industrial strategy to which the Secretary of State put his name—that we need to maintain certain key capabilities in the United Kingdom—or is the real truth that this is just further evidence that defence policy is now seen by the federalists as the best vehicle for securing the united states of Europe?

Mr. Ingram: Every sector involved in defence and procurement has welcomed the defence industrial strategy. That is not to say that it is completely fixed or that everyone is in total agreement, but trade unions and industry have welcomed it, because we have not previously had a clear exposition of the way forward. What are our future horizons? What type of equipment are we likely to need, and what are the industry's core capabilities to provide it? What research do we need to undertake to underpin all this? We have embarked on a close examination of these issues, and as I said to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) in answer to her original question, there are some very tight timelines to work to. We have to get this right, but such carping from the sidelines does not accord with the view of industry or the trade unions, and it certainly is not in line with what we believe to be right for defence.

Army Discharge

9. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): How many serving soldiers from Coventry, South and the midlands have made an application for discharge. [72203]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom Watson): There are no centrally held records that identify the town or region of origin of those personnel who have applied for discharge; however, I will make available those records that specify the nationality of such applicants. We are constantly seeking to improve our information systems, and I have asked officials to explore whether we can offer such a level of detail in future.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and I welcome him to the Dispatch Box. What is he doing about recruitment and retention in some of the famous west midlands regiments, such as the Royal Warwickshire Fusiliers?

Mr. Watson: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I know that he has been a campaigner on behalf of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, which has recently been given an additional grant to run a marketing campaign locally to help to make good the shortfall in recruits across two of its battalions. We all know that if we want the best armed forces in the world, we have to recruit the best people.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Is it not the case that our armed forces are now overstretched as never before and that applications for discharge are likely to increase, not fall? What steps are the Government taking to pre-empt the situation?

Mr. Watson: I do not accept the premise of the hon. Gentleman's question. For example, the outflow from the Territorial Army was 16,000 for 1999-2000 and last year it was only 8,000. We are working on the issue. Times are challenging, but we have to find innovative ways to recruit and retain military personnel, and we continue to do so.

Afghanistan

10. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Afghanistan. [72204]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): The situation across Afghanistan is broadly stable, but in the south it has deteriorated in recent weeks. This is not a surprise. The arrival of international troops and additional Afghan forces into an area that was largely ungoverned was always likely to create some response. Those elements who stand to lose out as the Government of Afghanistan spread their authority will try to disrupt our efforts early. But we have always anticipated that and planned accordingly.

Dr. Kumar: I welcome my right hon. Friend to his new post and praise our forces for taking on the Taliban. My right hon. Friend has my strong support for all the effort that we are making to remove the Taliban, and we should not move a millimetre from that policy. What support are we getting from the Government of Pakistan, especially on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, in our efforts to remove the Taliban?

Des Browne: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome and his support for the work that we are doing in Afghanistan, and especially for those whom we have charged with that responsibility. Because of the geography, the border with Pakistan is porous and difficult to control, but the Pakistani authorities have made extensive efforts to improve the rule of law along their border with Afghanistan and, as a consequence, have suffered significant loss of life on occasions. We will continue to work with the Pakistan authorities to make certain that appropriate action is taken to ensure that the border area does not become a safe haven for the Taliban.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): May I put it to the Secretary of State that to anybody who has served in the armed forces in Islamic countries, or who knows Afghanistan, ministerial replies—I do not blame him particularly, but the whole Government—seem totally unrealistic? Vietnam has been mentioned, but the Americans had half a million troops there. A shortage of helicopters has been mentioned, but the Russians lost 60 of them, and they had 300,000 troops there. The idea that our gallant group of 5,000 people will make any useful impact is sheer madness.

Des Browne: In anticipation of being asked that very question at some stage, I asked some very experienced currently serving officers of the highest rank of the British armed forces. They said to me in terms that those who make that point do not, unfortunately, have a proper understanding of the modern Army and the contribution that it can make in such circumstances. Those officers pointed out to me that the most significant difference between what we seek to do in Afghanistan and what others tried to do in the past is that we do it in the context of a democratically elected Afghanistan Government, who have a capacity to bring to bear on their own citizens, and with a significant level of international support. While I recognise that the hon. Gentleman has experience in his past that I do not have in mine, he will forgive me if in this matter I depend on the advice of those currently serving.

Iraq

11. Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): what proportion of UK forces which have served in Iraq have been reserve forces. [72205]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): On average, reservists have provided some 10 per cent. of the service manpower supporting Operation Telic.

Martin Linton: Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the 202 members of the London Regiment who served in Basra, and does he agree that the greater age, experience, maturity and diversity of members of the Territorial Army has been a great asset to the coalition forces in Basra in establishing better relations with the local population? Does he agree that that proves the value of reserve forces in peacebuilding and peacekeeping roles in the future?

Mr. Ingram: I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend and, like him, pay particular tribute to the London Regiment. I recently visited 7 Brigade, the Desert Rats, which has just returned from Iraq, and I was very struck, as I have been for many years, by how integrated the TA is with the regular forces. It is impossible to tell them apart in terms of training, commitment, professionalism, dedication to task and their willingness to defend the interests of this country. The TA is a formidable body of men and women no matter where it serves—whether in Basra, which my hon. Friend mentioned, in Kosovo, Bosnia, Afghanistan or elsewhere. Wherever we post the TA, its members serve with the highest distinction. By rebalancing the TA, we have tried to give it a new focus and structure that will make it even better, which would be a big achievement.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I was very interested to hear the Minister talking about the integration of the Territorials and reservists with the regular Army. The fact remains, however, that many wounded reservists and Territorials are treated disgracefully when they take off their uniforms and finish active operations. Can the Minister assure me that our brave Territorials and reservists will be treated properly in future and not have to depend just on local NHS facilities?

Mr. Ingram: I agree with the general sentiments that the hon. Gentleman expresses, but it has been ever thus, and we have to address some of the issues. One of the early lessons we learned from Operation Telic and from Afghanistan was that individual specialists were returning not to a unit, base or barracks but to their normal job—or sometimes not—and isolation was causing them problems. We have embarked on a complete examination of the provision of that support. I mentioned my visit to the Desert Rats; they operate a system known as "home rat" for families left at home, not just in Germany but for TA families too. The proposals for our new mental health care initiative offer another good example of how we are addressing the issue. We have learned some valuable lessons about something that was not new for this Government, and we are addressing it.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you may know, all 12 Members of Parliament in Staffordshire—Labour and Conservative—oppose the merger of the Staffordshire ambulance service with the West Midlands ambulance service. Last week, the Secretary of State for Health wrote to all Members of Parliament. In her note, she said that the Staffordshire ambulance service would be reprieved from the merger for up to 24 months. When the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), made his statement in the House he was questioned closely about the matter, but he neither confirmed nor denied that the merger would take place within 24 months. Now we hear that there may have been a drafting error in the written statement, which is causing great confusion among Members and people who work in the ambulance service. There is more of a shambles than at the Home Office, and that is saying something.

Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister or the Secretary of State to make a written statement before the recess to clarify once and for all whether the Staffordshire ambulance service is to be merged with the West Midlands service?

Mr. Speaker: The appropriate Minister will have heard what the hon. Gentleman has just said. There is nothing to stop him tabling a parliamentary question to seek clarification of the matter—

Michael Fabricant: As I have done.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps after the recess week the hon. Gentleman might apply for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Following the many tributes to the late Eric Forth from both sides of the House last week, I seek your advice on a matter relating to the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who wrote a piece headed "Letter from Westminster", which I assume is a regular column in her local newspaper, The Romsey Advertiser, in which she referred to the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill and her fear that the "very obstructive" actions of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and Eric Forth would scupper the Bill. She continued:

"In the end all was well. I don't know whether this had anything to do with the fact that Eric Forth could not turn up due to being 'under the weather'. Very appropriate excuse for non attendance at a discussion on climate change."

The hon. Lady does mention in the article, which was published on Friday, that Eric Forth had died on Wednesday, but it was mentioned in parenthesis. Many hon. Members would find that very insensitive. I have spoken to the hon. Lady this morning—she is on a Select Committee visit to the United States. Although she had conveyed a message to the newspaper to withdraw the article, or at least to put it in some context, what advice can you give to Members about the importance of ensuring that that which appears above our own names in print is our responsibility? Will you caution us about being insensitive and about the fact that if we fear that something that we have committed to print may be insensitive and offend Members—and, indeed, the wider public—we should ourselves take care to ensure that it does not appear in print?

Mr. Speaker: I can only say that hon. Members know that they have responsibility for their own words—whether oral or in writing—and they must take on that responsibility. It should not be for an editor to look after these matters; they are responsible for them. The matters that the hon. Gentleman mentions clearly took place outside the House and I have no control over them.

I can only end by saying that last Thursday hon. Members on both sides of the House paid great tribute to Eric Forth. Any member of the public is entitled to read in Hansard just how highly the House regarded Eric Forth, and I include myself in that.

Orders of the Day

Armed Forces Bill

As amended in the Select Committee, considered in Committee.

[MRS SYLVIA HEAL in the Chair]

3.37 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. We have some very quirky practices in the House, one of which has brought about the collapse of amendments to the Bill in Committee. A number of hon. Members wanted to table amendments, but because the House rose very early at about 1.30 pm on Thursday those amendments were not tabled and could not be selected.

I wanted to table amendments on the Wednesday, but they needed to be tidied up and put in the right place. I had constituency duties on the Thursday morning, and by 2 o'clock, when I said that they were ready to be tabled, the House was not sitting so they could not be tabled. They are therefore not eligible to be considered, despite the fact that they are important amendments. I am particularly aggrieved by that, although I do not blame the Clerks—it is because of the quirky nature of this muddle. My amendments would have been tabled as starred amendments, so they would not have been selected, but they would at least have appeared on the amendment paper. I had five amendments, and I would have very much appreciated their being recorded in the official record. One of them, for example, said:

"Clause 50, page 22, line 7, at the end insert"—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): Order. I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, but I must remind him that the Bill was reported from the Select Committee at the end of April. Although the business finished early last Thursday, I would have thought that from the end of April—I am not giving a precise date—until last week provided sufficient time for right hon. and hon. Members to table amendments to the Bill.

Harry Cohen: Further to that point of order, Mrs. Heal. The Bill was not timetabled. It is an incredibly complex Bill, with 378 detailed clauses and many aspects to it. I had to obtain quite a detailed briefing from the Library on several of those aspects. In those circumstances, it is reasonable to believe that even if such amendments are not taken because they are starred, they should appear somewhere on the official record. I want my amendments to be on the official record in some way because the issues that I attempted to raise are important. I ask you not to give me a negative answer, Mrs. Heal, but to find some arrangement whereby my amendments are on the official record, even if they cannot be taken. I wish to raise them as a point of order and mention them so that they are on the official record. Will you give me the opportunity to do that?

The First Deputy Chairman: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but I am afraid that I cannot give him that permission. The Public Bill Office tabled all the amendments that were received in time. I understand the circumstances, but I regret to say that there is nothing that I can do at this stage to help him.

Harry Cohen: You have been given incorrect—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order.

Harry Cohen rose—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. May I help the hon. Gentleman?

Harry Cohen rose—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will take his seat, I think that I will be able to help him. If he cares to take his amendments to the Public Bill Office, we will make sure that they are put in the Vote Office for him. That is the best that I can do to help him.

Harry Cohen: I appreciate that. Thank you, Mrs. Heal

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom Watson): I beg to move,

That the Bill be considered in the following order, namely, Clauses 1 to 53, Schedule 1, Clauses 54 to 113, Schedule 2, Clauses 114 to 163, Schedule 3, Clauses 164 to 168, Schedule 4, Clauses 169 to 180, Schedule 5, Clauses 181, Schedule 6, Clauses 182 to 205, Schedule 7, Clauses 206 to 271, Schedule 8, Clauses 272 to 275, Schedule 9, Clauses 276 and 277, Schedule 10, Clauses 278 to 319, Schedule 11, Clauses 320 to 347, Schedule 12, Clauses 348 and 349, Schedule 13, Clauses 350 to 354, Schedule 14, Clauses 355 to 363, Schedule 15, Clauses 364 to 371, Schedules 16 and 17, Clauses 372 to 378, new Clauses, new Schedules, any remaining proceedings on the Bill.

The motion sets out the order of consideration for today's proceedings in Committee. It follows exactly the same order as was used in the Select Committee on the Bill. It was the Committee's view that, with a large and complex Bill arranged in a logical sequence, it should be debated in that sequence, with the schedules brought up with their relevant clauses. As Lewis Carroll said:

"Begin at the beginning...and go on till you come to the end: then stop."

Question put and agreed to.

Clauses 1 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8

DESERTION

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 5, line 14, leave out from 'property;' to the end of line 15.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 9, in page 5, line 18, leave out from 'offence' to 'must' in line 20.

John McDonnell: I absolutely sympathise with my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) about the process by which amendments to the Bill were garnered. It was exceptionally unfair to several hon. Members who were busy on that particular day, despite the earlier timetabling.

3.45 pm

There has been a natural tendency for those with military experience to engage in past debates on military subjects more thoroughly than others. At times, those of us without military experience have felt that our views have somehow not been valued as much as theirs. However, despite the fact that some of us have taken a separate view from that of large sections of the House in previous debates, especially on military action, we all come to such debates with empathy and respect for those who serve in the military.

Let my put on the record my family experience. My father served in the Army in the second world war. One of my uncles served in the RAF and another served in the Navy. On my mother's side, my grandfather served in the first world war and my great-grandfather served in the first world war and the Boer war. We thus come to the debate with a shared experience over generations and a respect for those who serve in the military for what they do and the essential role that they play in securing the safety of this country. We also come to the debate following discussions with serving personnel and those who are no longer serving. Such people have had experiences in Northern Ireland, the Falklands, the Balkans and, more recently, Iraq.

I tabled amendments Nos. 8 and 9—perhaps a bit more expeditiously than my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead, but with only hours to spare—because I wanted to encourage a debate about desertion. When the Bill was introduced, it was presented as a non-contentious tidying-up exercise that was largely to do with legalised drafting to consolidate existing laws. However, it was also argued that the Bill would give us the opportunity to update laws that applied to those serving in the military and civilians associated with military activity.

Clause 8, however, does not update existing law. It translates almost exactly the existing threat of life imprisonment for those who refuse to fight—those who desert—from past law into new law. It also extends that threat to those who refuse to participate in the occupation of subjugated countries and territories. Clause 40 again translates existing sanctions into new law by threatening those who incite others to desert with life imprisonment.

The threat of life imprisonment in such circumstances is little short of barbaric. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) has tabled new clauses 1 and 2, which relate to what happened during the first world war. At that time, we deprived people of their lives for desertion by shooting them at dawn. Through the Bill, we are maintaining the deprivation of life by threatening to imprison people for the rest of their lives if they refuse to engage in military activity or the occupation of a foreign country. I thought that we would have moved on from the last century and that we would have the opportunity to abolish that sanction by updating our legislation.

I also thought that we would have learned more about why people desert from our experiences of the two world wars and, more recently, of the Balkans and Iraq. In many instances, people desert because of fear about the threat to their lives and safety and because of trauma. Many such people are in absolute panic. In particular, owing to the debate about the casualties of the first world war through the shot-at-dawn campaign, I thought that we were developing a more sympathetic understanding that we did not need to use such barbaric sanctions.

There are others whose refusal to fight is based upon conscience. We have had that debate in this Chamber on a number of occasions when deciding whether to send our troops to war. We are able to exercise our right of conscience. I remember the debate about Iraq and our heavy discussions about the theory of just war and whether Iraq was a just war. I thought that we had extended that right of conscience to military personnel.

I appreciate that there is a system under which people can claim to be conscientious objectors. From the evidence from the Peace Pledge Union and others that was provided to the Select Committee that considered the Bill, it is clear that that system is not regulated within statute. It is a procedure, but it is not within this legislation, which was meant to update and to consolidate the processes of law controlling issues around desertion. I thought that, eventually, it would control the processes for the exercise of conscience.

While taking evidence, we discovered that military personnel were not adequately informed not only of their right to exercise their right of conscience, but of the processes themselves. The position was outlined in the Select Committee by the Peace Pledge Union. That brought forth a memorandum from the Ministry of Defence, which at least explained the process, even though it had not advertised it in any leaflets or in the practical advice given to serving personnel. The rejection of the process of an armed forces federation to assist those who wish to exercise their right undermines their ability to access the procedures themselves. I hope that later, in a debate on a new clause, we may accede to the request to strengthen the right of representation for serving military personnel.

I do not believe that this part of the Bill is a tidying-up exercise. I believe that the Bill is really about the war in Iraq. We are aware that the number of absconders has trebled since the invasion of Iraq. There has been an increase in the number of soldiers questioning Government policy about that invasion, an increase in the number of soldiers questioning the morality and legality of the occupation and an increase in the number of serving personnel speaking out.

Harry Cohen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and for his support for my point of order earlier, which came over somewhat awkwardly—my point of order, that is, not his support for me, which was very eloquent. Clause 8(3)(a) says that "relevant service" means:

"actions or operations against an enemy".

He said that the clause applied to Iraq. My understanding is that we have not declared anyone an enemy. I know that a war on terror has been announced, but can he cast some light on who is an enemy in these circumstances? It is said that there are insurgents and terrorists. We know that British soldiers have died. Why cannot the Committee be told who actually is the enemy? Why cannot it be legislated for in some way?

John McDonnell: That is a valid point. The lack of definition of an enemy has enticed the Government to include in clause 8(3) as a relevant service

"military occupation of a foreign country or territory."

Without definition of an enemy, service during an occupation of another country is sufficient for withdrawal from that service and refusal to participate in that action to qualify as desertion. I believe that legislation of that sort will fail. No increase in the severity of punishment will prevent servicemen and women from speaking out.

Many have paid their respects—as I have, too—to serving personnel for the bravery that they show and their professionalism in carrying out their duties, but I also want to salute those who have had the courage and bravery to exercise their moral judgment, and those who have followed their conscience and said no to fighting. They have not supported the occupation and they have refused to serve. I pay tribute to Ben Griffin from the SAS, who said to us last week that he was not willing to support, in his professional life, the invasion of Iraq and the immoral and illegal war in Iraq. I also pay tribute to Flight Lieutenant Malcolm Kendall-Smith, a person of conscience who is in a military prison as a result of refusing to serve in Iraq. Their views should be respected. They, and others who come forward in future, should not be threatened with life imprisonment. History will be their judge, as was the case with the first world war. The people who opposed that barbarism were, in fact, sane and courageous. History will judge individuals who stood up and refused to fight in Iraq, or to support the occupation, to be heroes.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I am interested in my hon. Friend's argument. Would he apply the same logic to Kosovo, Sierra Leone and Afghanistan? Does he think that members of the armed forces should exercise their conscience at will, no matter what the country's determination, no matter that it is under a UN mandate, and no matter that assistance is being delivered for a great humanitarian cause? What is the logic of his position?

John McDonnell: Individual members of a voluntary, professional military service have the right as citizens to exercise their judgment in the same way as we do. They should not face the sanction of life imprisonment—that is what the Bill proposes—for exercising that judgment.

Mr. Watson: May I clarify something for my hon. Friend? Refusal to take part is not desertion, but it may give rise to an offence of disobeying a lawful order, which carries a maximum sentence of 10 years.

John McDonnell: Desertion is defined in the Bill as absence without leave. We are threatening someone who refuses to serve or who goes missing, whether as a result of fear, trauma or conscience, with life imprisonment. As I said, people who stand firm on the right of conscience will be judged the real heroes, as they made a judgment about Iraq and, I believe, provide an example to us all in the exercise of conscience, no matter what the cost.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I did not intend to speak in this debate, so I shall be brief in my support of the Government's proposals.

Parliament sets a maximum penalty, not a minimum. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) addressed hard cases—I am not sure whether or not I have his attention—but that is not relevant to the setting of a maximum penalty. If we set a minimum penalty, he could make his case, but the measure is required to cover all eventualities. The historical background that he gave illustrates that point. No one has greater admiration or affection for the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) than I, but the campaign that he has waged on first world war executions overlooks many inconvenient facts. I was privileged to be briefed on the issue by a retired Air Force officer, who spent a year or two going through every one of the 260 folders that survive from the 300 original folders. He examined the background, and he established that there was a total of 3,000 cases: 90 per cent. of executions were refused on appeal. Among the small number of executions, there appear to be a few cases in which there was a genuine injustice. I shall cite an example of a case for which most hon. Members would accept that a sanction of some sort was appropriate. A professional solder who joined the Army five years before the first world war deserted—

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. I am showing uncharacteristic restraint, as the hon. Gentleman is talking about something which, I hope, we will discuss later. I would obviously want to respond, but his example is quite irrelevant, I submit, to clause 8.

The First Deputy Chairman: I was about to remind the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) that the discussion of detail comes later in the day. Perhaps he could relate his comments to the amendment under discussion.

4 pm

Mr. Brazier: Indeed, Mrs Heal. I was giving the example of someone who deserted without seeing action at all, although he had been a professional soldier for five years.

On the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington, a maximum penalty must cover all eventualities. The Minister asked him about all the other cases. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington replied that the provision dealt with desertion, but we are dealing with cases of desertion and of people refusing to participate—two separate circumstances for which different maximum penalties are set out in the Bill. Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that anybody who has opted to wear the Queen's uniform should not potentially face very grave charges if they refuse to go into action? In an action that the entire country strongly supports, even perhaps—God preserve us—another world war, is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that someone who chose to put on a uniform, with all that that means, and then refuses to participate, should be able to say, "Christ, I might get shot at. I don't want to go," without facing potentially serious charges?

Producing hard cases has no relevance whatever to maximum penalties. The hard cases can be argued one by one in the courts. That is what we have courts martial for. I urge the hon. Gentleman to think again. If we are trying to run armed forces of which we have good reason to be proud, and the hon. Gentleman has good reason to be proud of his forebears who served in them, we must have disciplinary penalties. On this measure, the Government are entirely right.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Having spent three months on the Bill—

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Four months.

Mr. Jones: Four months, I am reminded, and some of us were more assiduous than others—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) says from a sedentary position that he would have deserted. In the present circumstances, the Government would have welcomed that.

When I saw the amendments and a press release issued by my hon. Friend, I was worried that we had missed something in the Bill. I was concerned that the civil servants had got one over on us—[Interruption.] Someone says, "Surely not", but those who served on the Committee know that that it was a good process, both the Select Committee and the report. I had to do some research this morning to find out what the current position was, and I think that what is proposed is an improvement on the current position.

As I understand it, the 1955 Act set out a two-tier system—punishment of up to two years for desertion and another sanction, life imprisonment, for more serious cases, defined as desertion from active service. The definition of active service referred to occupation of a foreign country, so the reference in the Bill is nothing new. That Act was superseded by the 1971 Bill, which removed the lower sanction because of the situation in Northern Ireland, since the definition of active service could not be applied to deployment in another part of the United Kingdom.

Under the present system, the maximum sentence for desertion is up to life imprisonment. The Bill in its present form is an improvement because it reverts to the 1955 position, by introducing a two-tier system. There will be the possibility of imprisonment for up to two years, but the other sanction—rightly, in my opinion—is up to life imprisonment for the more serious offences.

I know that many hon. Members are worried about the reference to "occupation of a foreign country".

I understand my hon. Friend's position on Iraq. It is not one that I share, but I credit him with being consistent and forceful in his arguments for it. As I said, the reference to occupation of a foreign country was part of the original definition of active service. Therefore, I do not see any great change there, but I understand why there may be concerns. However, a reintroduction of the two-tier system is better than the previous position.

Harry Cohen: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a difference between a legal occupation and an illegal occupation?

Mr. Jones: That is an argument that can be had around a specific campaign such as the one in Iraq. I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but he knows that we disagree on that. The important point is that if people have agreed to serve in Her Majesty's armed forces, there must be some sanction or control over their actions. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington referred to those who were shot at dawn during the first world war. I shall seek to catch your eye later, Mrs. Heal, to speak on that matter, about which I have great sympathies, but there is a great difference between a conscript, who has no choice over going to war, and those who take the conscious decision to join Her Majesty's armed forces. Without some kind of sanction, how would one operate in any circumstances? We cannot have armed forces who pick and choose when and where they serve.

John McDonnell: My hon. Friend served long and hard on the Committee so he knows the Bill inside out, poor man. The amendment would maintain the two-year sanction, but not that of life imprisonment, which appears inhumane and barbaric.

Mr. Jones: I disagree. The measure does not say the sentence for desertion will automatically be life imprisonment, but up to life imprisonment, so there is flexibility in sentencing. The idea has been sold that somehow if one deserts one will automatically get life imprisonment, and that is not the case.

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): In conflict, if a platoon were reliant on an individual to hold a particular post and that individual decided to desert that post, putting at risk the lives of everyone in the platoon, would it not be important to have a severe consequence?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend's point goes to the kernel of the argument. In the armed forces the ultimate sanction must be there for the sake of military discipline in very difficult situations. As I have said, there is a great difference between conscripted armed forces and those who have volunteered and made a conscious decision to serve in the armed forces.

I also agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington about the way in which our armed forces can make representations. I spoke on the armed forces federation when I moved new clause 23 in Committee, and if I have the opportunity I shall speak on that matter again today. An issue has been raised as a result of the situation in Iraq, not so much on this clause but on how our armed forces obtain redress for some of their grievances, not just those that arise from their service abroad, but here.

I shall resist the amendment because the measure is an advance, rather than turning the clock back, as the amendment suggests.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on the measured way in which he has moved the amendments. I have some sympathy with where he is coming from, but I find myself unable to support them. They do not have quite the effect that the hon. Gentleman maintains, and it is just as well that they do not. I sympathise with him in that I, like him, opposed the Iraq war, and because in almost any circumstances that I can imagine the penalty of life imprisonment would be way over the top. Like him, I take the view that the arrangements for armed servicemen to claim conscientious objection are not working in practice, whatever they may say in theory, and like him I think that other shortcomings of the Bill result in a failure to address some of the grievances and points raised by people to whom both he and I will have spoken.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is mistaken in two regards. First, as other hon. Members have said, the existing legislation already includes the potential penalty of life imprisonment for anyone who deserts while on active service overseas. Although subsection (3)(c) does not add anything to the body of law, the hon. Gentleman is mistaken in suggesting that it somehow constitutes a toughening of the law, because servicemen who desert while on active service overseas can already go to a general court martial, where they face possible life imprisonment. Secondly, given that clause 163 leaves in place the maximum potential penalty, the amendment will not achieve the objective that the hon. Gentleman explained at the outset.

John McDonnell: The Bill was presented as allowing the updating of service law, which gives us the opportunity to rid ourselves of some of the punitive punishments in existing law, one of which is life imprisonment. I would welcome the hon. Gentleman's views on clause 40, which also introduces life imprisonment for incitement based on actions undertaken under clause 8.

Nick Harvey: The hon. Gentleman is right on that particular issue. It is just as well that the amendment will not have the intended effects. If British servicemen were to carry out perfectly legal actions overseas, such as actions agreed by United Nations resolution, and were to conduct themselves entirely in accordance with international humanitarian law, it would be a serious matter if someone were to up sticks and leave, because, as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) has said, it would endanger others in their units. That should not be viewed as a small offence and I do not think that a maximum two-year sentence would be adequate in such circumstances.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill benchmarks life imprisonment in statute?

Nick Harvey: No; the Bill does not change the position. Existing statute allows a sentence of up to life imprisonment. I understand the point made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington—that the Bill might have been an opportunity to modernise the legislation completely—but I do not accept the argument that the Bill makes the situation worse. Although some have pointed out that including subsection (3)(c), which concerns an invasion of foreign territory, on the face of the Bill is profound, I do not believe that it will change the existing law. Although I sympathise with some of the points made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington, the amendments will not have the effect that he seeks, and I think that it is as well that they do not, because it would not be desirable to reduce that serious offence to an offence that carries a maximum two-year sentence.

Harry Cohen: That was a very interesting contribution by the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), and a typically Liberal one—it was a fence-sitting exercise.

Nick Harvey indicated dissent.

Harry Cohen: Well, I will give him an example of where he is fence-sitting. Clause 8 provides for a life sentence for the offence of desertion. Only every now and then does a Bill come before us to amend the Armed Forces Acts. He might say that this is no different from what we had before, or that it is slightly but not substantively different, but either he supports the provision of life imprisonment or he does not. He gave the impression that he does not, but then made it clear, by not supporting the amendment, that he does.

4.15 pm

Nick Harvey: We are being presented with two options—one is a maximum of two years, and the other is a maximum of life imprisonment. I have agreed as a general point of principle that life imprisonment would be over the top in any circumstances that I can envisage, but the only alternative is a maximum of two years. I have clearly expressed the view that that would not be adequate as a penalty for people committing a very serious offence by, having been deployed in perfectly legitimate circumstances, leaving their comrades in an unsustainable position. I did not sit on the fence—I came to a firm view.

Harry Cohen: The clause provides for life, and there is an amendment that would delete that. The hon. Gentleman either supports that or he does not. If not, these are weasel words, quite frankly. I heard what he said in his speech, but it is not the same as his actions.

[Harry Cohen]

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) emphasised that under clause 8, life is a possibility, and I support him in wanting to get rid of that.

Mr. MacNeil: Clause 8 does not cover only desertion in the heat of battle, because subsection (2) states:

"For the purposes of this Act a person deserts if he is absent without leave and...he intends to avoid any particular service or kind of service".

That could lead to people who might have a real conscientious objection to a particular action, or a war such as Iraq, facing life in prison.

Harry Cohen: That is right. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington is seeking to get rid of that hugely excessive sentence, and that is why his amendment is worthy of support.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to his post and wish him great success in it. I am sure that I will be more supportive of him on other occasions. However, I was a little alarmed when he intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington to refer to absence without leave, the sentence for which, under clause 9, must not exceed two years. Indeed, he could have referred to disobedience to lawful commands, for which, under clause 12, the sentence is not to exceed 10 years. There is a bit of cherry-picking going on whereby the military authorities, or perhaps the Ministry of Defence, can pick and choose which sentence they want to apply to those who use the illegality of the war in Iraq as their defence. In the end, they could still use clause 8, which provides for a sentence of up to life.

Mr. Watson: I thank my hon. Friend for making my first day at the office so welcoming. I should remind him that this will be decided by a legal process, not by the Ministry of Defence or Ministers. The Bill sets out the parameters. It is not a mandatory life sentence, but a maximum life sentence, and the sentence meted out will be in relation to the crime committed.

Harry Cohen: I acknowledge that this will not be for the Ministry of Defence; I would not expect Ministers to make such decisions. However, it still leaves the military authorities with the power to cherry-pick. If they do not like the person concerned, they can go for clause 8, which provides for up to life.

Mr. Watson: Just for clarification, these decisions will not be made by the military, but by the independent legal authorities.

Harry Cohen: That is amazing because, if they were independent legal authorities, we would not have a court martial system, and civil and criminal law would apply across the board. Military legal authorities can cherry-pick if they wish.

Such Bills come up for review by the House only rarely. We should therefore take the opportunity now to get rid of the excessive sentence that is applied and which can be applied to those who have serious conscientious objections, for example, to the war in Iraq.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The hon. Gentleman and I opposed the war. I spoke in almost all the debates about it and was contacted by many members of Her Majesty's armed forces who had serious concerns about the action that the Government proposed to take. I respected those views, which they did not reach in the height of battle. They volunteered for service under the Crown and, whatever we think about the war, it took place, and the majority of those who had serious concerns made them known before they were deployed in theatre. They did not desert their posts at the height of battle. My advice to people who approached me was that members of the armed forces who opposed the war should make their opposition known before they were deployed and went to the front, that they should certainly not desert their mates while they were there and that, if they did, I believed that serious consequences should follow.

Harry Cohen: I accept that, but many people are effectively "deserting" when they are in this country and do not wish to go on another tour of duty in Iraq because of the unfolding circumstances, in which they have witnessed some of the atrocities, which have certainly been against the law, and seen the Attorney-General's statements to the Cabinet, which were revealed bit by bit. It is not unreasonable for people, such as Flight Lieutenant Malcolm Kendall-Smith, who went on an earlier tour, to say, "I've looked at what happened since and I don't support it."

Mr. Kevan Jones: In a nightmare scenario for the MOD, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead is appointed a Minister, what would he do in circumstances whereby Parliament had decided that our troops should serve abroad on a humanitarian mission, or, for example, in Afghanistan, where the occupation is universally sanctioned, and someone said that they were not prepared to fight or go on the mission? Does he suggest that members of the armed forces should pick and choose when they serve?

Harry Cohen: First, I am grateful not to be a Minister in the MOD. I never had any expectation of being one. However, I have always argued from the Back Benches that whatever our forces do should comply with the law of this country and international law, which should not be downgraded.

A sentence of up to life is excessive and should not be on the statute book. The Library has provided a host of alternative sentences, even to detention. They include dismissal, forfeiture of seniority, reduction in rank, a fine, a severe reprimand, stoppages of pay and minor punishments, including community punishments, which would be appropriate for conscientious objectors. We allow community activity and that would be appropriate for someone who was akin to a conscientious objector. The Library paper says of community punishments that "a sentence of this kind may not be passed unless the court considers that the offence is serious enough to warrant it".

A serious offence therefore leads to such a punishment. That makes it clear that a sentence of up to life is excessive.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I have a great deal of sympathy with many of the issues that the hon. Gentleman takes up, but he has lost the plot on this one in relation to the crime that has been committed. Any service person leaving their post in this country in peace time would be dealt with in a particular way, but the example has been given of someone deserting in the heat of battle resulting in the death or endangerment of his comrades. Surely that must warrant the most severe sentence. Will the hon. Gentleman get off the fence and tell us what he thinks the sentence should be for that kind of action?

Harry Cohen: I hear what the hon. Gentleman is saying, and my colleagues have just whispered to me that such action is covered elsewhere in the Bill, under the misconduct clauses. We are talking here about the clause that is most applicable to people who consider that the war in Iraq was wrong and illegal. We are not talking about the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman has described in relation to those people. People leaving in the heat of battle are dealt with elsewhere in the Bill. So why does this provision need to include a life sentence?

Mr. Fiello: The recent case of the flight lieutenant has been used as an example of why a life sentence is inappropriate. However, my understanding is that that case was brought not for desertion but for failing to obey a lawful order, so I am surprised that that example is being cited time and again in support of the argument about desertion. I should like to repeat the question that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) has just asked; what would my hon. Friend do if the lives of a company of 70 or 80 men were put at risk, or possibly lost, because one person who had a crucial role in the company decided to desert?

Harry Cohen: Those circumstances are dealt with elsewhere in the Bill—[HON. MEMBERS: "No, they are not."] Yes, they are. They are dealt with under the misconduct provisions. We do not need the provisions in clause 8 to go to this extent.

Mr. Hancock: Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the Committee where in the Bill this issue is dealt with? I have read the Bill, and I cannot find it.

Harry Cohen: My understanding is that it is in clause 12, and presumably clause 13 as well.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): And in clause 2(1)(b).

Harry Cohen: Indeed. That clause deals with misconduct on operations. We do not need the provision in clause 8 as well, as it will allow the legal authorities to cherry-pick which sentence to apply. They will choose the harshest sentence if they want to.

Clause 8(3) deals with the definitions of "relevant service", and includes

"actions or operations against an enemy".

But it is no longer clear-cut who the enemy is, as we no longer officially declare war.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I want to help my hon. Friend in regard to clause 2, which deals with misconduct. He says that subsection (1)(b) is relevant to his argument, but subsection (7) states:

"A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable to any punishment mentioned in the Table in section 163, and any sentence of imprisonment imposed in respect of the offence may be for life."

The first punishment listed in the table in clause 163 is "imprisonment".

Harry Cohen: That deals with a mutiny, where people are getting together. I am talking about people exercising their individual conscience, which is very different.

Clause 8(3) defines "relevant service" as, among other things,

"actions or operations against an enemy",

but we no longer define specifically who an enemy is.

Mr. Watson: I thank my hon. Friend for letting me in. We do define what an enemy is. Clause 367 states that anyone

"engaged in armed operations against any of Her Majesty's forces" is defined as an enemy.

Harry Cohen: Let me now—[Interruption.] I have two issues running at the same time here. I apologise to the Minister. I will come back to the point that he has made in a moment. One of my colleagues has just drawn to my attention paragraph 62 of the explanatory notes to the Bill, which states:

"The maximum sentence for desertion is generally two years' imprisonment. But the maximum is life imprisonment if the offender deserts when on service, or under orders to go on service, of the types described in the second bullet above, or if his intention is to avoid such service."

However, a stricter distinction is needed in relation to those who, as the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) said, put lives at risk in the heat of battle. That issue must be distinguished from that of those who say that the Iraq war is illegal under international law and who exercise their conscience and personal responsibility in that regard. The fact that we are having this argument shows the muddled way in which the clauses have been devised and worded and the lack of proper consideration of them; otherwise, we would not be having this dispute about what the provision means. The Government should therefore accept the amendment, so that the life sentence for the second category to which I referred is withdrawn.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I was interested in my hon. Friend's point about legality. If, for example, someone had deserted in the run-up to the invasion of Iraq, when, clearly, there was no UN approval, no direct threat to this country and, therefore, no legal state of war, would it be correct to discipline that person?

Harry Cohen: In a sense, the point is made. In an earlier intervention, I made the point that international law is as important as law, and that should apply. This Government and Parliament have put a lot of personal responsibility on people to comply with the law. If they do not, the punishments are increased. Therefore, they must examine the law and international law as it applies in military terms. The punishment should therefore reflect that personal responsibility. As has been said, a life sentence is inappropriate.

As to who an enemy is, the Minister's intervention, in which he said that the situation is as it always has been, just will not do. In the second world war, we had a clearly defined enemy, which was referred to as an enemy. Now, even al-Qaeda is not referred to as an enemy in legislation or in what has been laid out in Parliament. Things have therefore changed considerably. If we are to apply such emphasis and impose such strict sentences on the basis of having an enemy, let us at least declare a war in the traditional way, so that we know who the enemy is, and so that people are clear about that. Otherwise, the enemy can change from day to day. In Iraq, is the enemy al-Qaeda, or is it nationalists? Who exactly is the enemy in Iraq?

Mr. Watson: If my hon. Friend does not want to read clause 367, which contains the tight definition of an enemy, let us make it more simple; it is the people who are shooting at our forces.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Except when they are the Americans.

Harry Cohen: As my hon. Friend says from a sedentary position, that could easily be the Americans in many cases. I am happy if the Minister wants to include in legislation the definition that anybody who shoots at our forces is the enemy. That is not in the legislation at the moment. If we are going to go to war and put such burdens on people, we should be explicit about who the enemy is in any given circumstances.

Subsection (3)(b) refers to

"operations outside the British Islands for the protection of life or property".

Does that cover Iraqi lives and property? Are they covered, or are they usefully ignored? Are we talking only about United Kingdom lives and property, or not? I am waiting for the Minister to intervene on that. After all, the Government claim that we are there on a legal basis. They claim that we are there according to the will of the United Nations, protecting Iraqi lives and property, although the property has been ripped off to an enormous degree and more than 100,000 lives have been lost. It is interesting that the Minister remains silent on that. That in itself could cause people to ask, as a defence, what lives or property they were actually defending.

The third paragraph, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, is the most objectionable in my view. It refers to "military occupation of a foreign country or territory".

It is important to establish whether that occupation is legal or illegal. If it is legal and properly authorised, I think that courts martial and sentences should follow; if it is illegal, that represents a solid defence, and that people who advance that defence should not be punished in the excessive way proposed by the Bill.

4.30 pm

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): Is not the point that my hon. Friend keeps making entirely oxymoronic? Is it not obvious that it will not be in the legislation? Can my hon. Friend not understand that it is not possible for this country's armed forces to launch or be involved in an illegal war? It has never happened, it will never happen, and it cannot happen. Only in the minds of mad conspiracy theorists does this country launch illegal wars. It is not possible, and that is why it is not accounted for in the Bill.

Harry Cohen: That was a very eloquent rant, but Kofi Annan said that the war was illegal, as have many other international jurists. Even the armed forces had to seek information on whether the war was legal. Even they were not sure. Then we had the weasel words—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I think that we are going wide of the amendments.

Harry Cohen: I shall go straight back to the point, Mrs. Heal. I was saying that I agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington. If military occupation of a foreign country or territory in such circumstances is illegal under international law, we are enshrining illegality in our law, and that is something that we should never do.

Let me make one more point, about the Nuremberg trials. When people said as a defence that they had been acting under orders, although their actions had been deemed illegal under international law, we said that that was not a defence. We said that they had to exercise personal responsibility. Now people are exercising personal responsibility. People like Flight Lieutenant Malcolm Kendall-Smith have looked at all the information that has dribbled out. He said that the war was illegal as far as he could see, that Kofi Annan had said it was illegal and that personal responsibility dictated that he should not take part in it.

Mr. Keetch: I think that the hon. Gentleman should make a distinction between the legality or otherwise of the action, conflict or war and the current occupation. There has been discussion about whether the war was legal. I take a view on that; I opposed the war, although the House voted for it. The occupation, however, is sanctioned by the United Nations Security Council, and is at the invitation of the democratically elected Government of the country, whatever we may think about that. Whatever the events of a couple of years ago, surely the hon. Gentleman accepts that the presence of British troops in Iraq now is legal.

Harry Cohen: There are a number of very serious points—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are now going outside the scope of the amendments. Once again, I ask hon. Members to address their remarks to the amendment under discussion.

Harry Cohen: Let me answer the hon. Gentleman's point briefly. As has been said, a good many illegal acts are going on—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have already ruled that that is out of order. Will the hon. Gentleman please address his remarks to the amendment under discussion?

Harry Cohen: Subsection 3(c) has the potential to enshrine an illegal occupation. People should exercise, and have the right to exercise, their personal responsibility. The punishments that we include in Acts of Parliament should reflect their right to do so; they should not be excessively harsh. The punishment of imprisonment up to life imprisonment, is exceptionally harsh and should be removed from the Bill. I urge the Liberals and everybody else to come off the fence and oppose it.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen); we are used to hearing his lengthy speeches. I salute the modesty with which the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) spoke and the due deference that he paid to the members of his family who have served in the armed forces. He approaches the amendment with a great deal of principle and thought. However, I think that I speak as the only person in here who has commanded a battalion, faced the prospect of operations, disciplined soldiers and encouraged them to go on operations and, indeed, to face the enemy.

I do not wish to come the barrack-room lawyer, but there is a degree of confusion about the points that we are addressing. Desertion is an extremely serious charge, and if you do not mind, Mrs. Heal, I shall address most of my comments to my personal experience in the Army, but they are equally applicable to the Navy, the Royal Air Force and the Royal Marines. As a lieutenant-colonel commanding a battalion of infantry, it was my job to deal with soldiers under the Army Act 1955. I had to deal with the charge of desertion, under the auspices of the 1955 Act, once in my two and a half years commanding the largest battalion in the British Army, and twice on operations. I had to deal with absence daily.

Some of the soldiers serving in Tidworth, where I had 950 soldiers mainly drawn—lucky devils—from the counties of Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire, would frequently "go abo", as the vernacular has it. In other words, they would go absent. They would exercise their personal freedom and choice, and, by golly, they paid for it. They were charged, if necessary, under the 1955 Act, and they were dealt with under various sections, but usually section 69. For periods of absence, they were dealt with by means of anything from a serious telling off, to a fine, to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 14 days. Such a period of imprisonment was the only one that I could regularly impose.

From time to time, soldiers would absent themselves—go absent—and go, usually, to the large conurbations. I, as a furious commanding officer with a furious adjutant, would say, "Charge this man with desertion." The advice that we received was, "Absolutely not. Do you realise what desertion means?" Having had 20-odd years experience as an infantry officer, I knew precisely what it meant. The guideline was that a soldier had to have been absent for more than 112 days and to have destroyed his identity card. That was the rule of thumb that we used before that soldier would appear in front of me to be remanded for trial by court martial. It was not a case in which a humble lieutenant-colonel could have become involved. The charge of desertion was extremely serious, and very serious penalties went with it.

I say to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington that unless one has served in a battalion, or on a warship or an air station, one does not understand the problem that officers face in trying to deal with soldiers, airmen or sailors daily. They are a rumbustious and difficult lot. They decide from time to time that they are going to exercise their personal freedom and drink too much, fight, go absent and so on. However, in my experience, things change enormously when that battalion is warned for operations.

4.45 pm

Soldiers will absent themselves before a battalion goes on operations. In my experience, not many absent themselves for reasons of cowardice. Many absent themselves—I continue to use that phrase, rather than "desert"—because they cannot get their heads round the difficulty of being abroad for six months, the potential dangers or domestic problems. Only once on operations did I have a soldier who absented himself in the face of the enemy, and he was not charged with desertion.

Flight Lieutenant Kendall-Smith was not charged with desertion: he was charged, I believe, with being absent, or with a similar charge within those parameters. He did not desert. Trooper Griffin behaved with much courage and probity. He had reached the rank of corporal in his parent regiment and then gone through the selection process for the Special Air Service—

Mr. MacNeil: I just wish to point out that under clause 8(4), anyone who intended to avoid service—when on relevant service or under orders for such service—would be liable to be sentenced to life in prison. That would apply to Mr. Kendall-Smith.

Patrick Mercer: But the point that I have been trying to make concerns the circumstances in which someone should be charged with desertion. In any case, he is not a Mr., but a flight lieutenant.

Trooper Griffin behaved with great courage, despite the fact that he was being paid a great deal more money every day than others of his rank and that he was in arguably the most prestigious armed organisation in the world. None the less, he had the courage to approach his commanding officer and say, "Enough is enough." I had similar instances, and I like to think that I dealt with them with fairness, kindness and compassion. I like to think that those are the watchwords of the commanders of our armed forces and that they deal not just with their own men, but with the Queen's enemies using the same rule of thumb.

Let us not talk about desertion, but let us say that a trained sustained-fire machine gunner, who carries the maximum firepower of his platoon, decides to absent himself—if he decides that he will not face the enemy, but would rather let down his mates—and that turns into desertion. I fear that we need to have the power to charge that man with desertion. The sentence in clause 8 is not a minimum sentence, but a maximum sentence. It has not been applied readily over the past several years. The plain fact is that if that man—it is, let us face it, likely to be a man—deserts from his unit, the punishment he faces from the men whom he let down will be administered in the back streets of Nottingham or Mansfield and military law probably needs to be in place to protect him from those whom he has let down.

We need to have a penalty for desertion. The Bill would make military law stronger, but the amendments would do nothing to help the soldiers, sailors and airmen, and the officers who have to discipline them. In fact, the amendments would undermine discipline. I understand and respect the political points that have been made by Labour Members, but they are not applicable in this case. We run the risk of confusing an extremely important issue.

Chris Bryant: It is a great honour to follow the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer). I am sure that all hon. Members agree that he made a particularly fine contribution to the debate. I disagree with him on only one point. I know that he brings a particular expertise to the debate, but one does not have to have been a serving officer to understand how important the concept of desertion is for discipline in the armed forces and for making it clear to every serviceman exactly what they have signed up to.

I also pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) and for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), although I am about to disagree with them. Both put their arguments with eloquence, but my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead did not seem to understand that the concept of "enemy" is quite well defined. Clause 367, on page 185, makes it clear that an enemy is "all persons engaged in armed operations against any of Her Majesty's forces or against any force co-operating with any of Her Majesty's forces...all pirates; and...all armed mutineers, armed rebels and armed rioters".

That is clearer than in previous statutes so my hon. Friend may want to reconsider that part of his argument.

I wholly disagree with amendment No. 8, which was proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington. Deletion of paragraph (c) of subsection (3) would have meant that during the occupation of Germany and Italy at the end of the second world war somebody could have deserted with impunity. My hon. Friend may respond that they would be covered by the provision in paragraph (a)

"actions or operations against an enemy".

In that case, what about people serving in Bosnia with UNFOR—the UN force? Over the last 10 years, our forces have operated under different operational commands at various times; none the less—certainly in the view of some people—they are in

"military occupation of a foreign country or territory".

I believe that they are doing important work, although in the near future we may want to reconsider the number of troops serving in the region, as normalisation steadily takes place in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and, in the fullness of time, in Kosovo.

My hon. Friend's amendment would wholly undermine many of our existing operations around the world and those in which we might choose to engage in future. If the Committee chose either to pass the amendment, which is unlikely given the contributions that have been made, or if a large number of Members were to support it in a Division, it would send a message to our armed forces not of ethical surety—as I am sure my hon. Friend intends—but of ethical chaos. I hope, therefore, that no Members will support it in the Division Lobby.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Why has my hon. Friend not mentioned paragraph (b) of subsection (3)—

"operations outside the British Islands for the protection of life or property"— which seems to cover the point he makes?

Chris Bryant: I do not know whether my hon. Friend has visited our forces in Bosnia, but if he did so, he would see that it would be hard to argue that that was not what they were doing. I do not want the Bill to be so amended that our armed forces are constantly unsure which provisions apply—to be wondering "Does this count? Is this ethically right or wrong?" My experience of the armed forces is limited—it is nowhere near that of the hon. Member for Newark—but through the armed forces parliamentary scheme I have met countless soldiers of varying ranks with extremely well-developed consciences. In fact, they probably need a more keenly developed conscience about military operations than they ever did in the past, but that need not undermine discipline. An essential part of the training of a modern soldier is being able to make ethical decisions.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a huge debate, especially among military families who have lost loved ones in Iraq, about not just the legality of the invasion of Iraq but the justice of the operation in the first place? The Committee needs to recognise that that debate is new and serious in our armed forces.

Chris Bryant: I am absolutely sure that my hon. Friend is right in that, but the Bill is not the place to have that debate. This clause on desertion is not about the war in Iraq. [Interruption.] It is not. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington and his colleagues would like to make it about that, but

I honestly do not think that it is, for the very important reason that desertion is not just about the individual soldier or officer; it is about the collective; it is about responsibility one to another—again, an essential part of the training of a soldier or an officer—and it is vital that we do not send out a message that completely undermines that concept.

My experience is that members of the armed forces today have an extremely developed sense of conscience and that they are encouraged to develop that sense of conscience, but it does not lead in just one direction. Conscience can lead, and I believe in the vast majority of cases has led, people to join the Army and to say, "Yes, here's a series of operations that I want to contribute to on behalf of my country, but also for the greater good." Whether we are talking about Bosnia, Afghanistan or Sierra Leone, there is a whole series of different interventions where people are going not because of some economic conscript situation that might apply in other parts of the world—they are not conscripts in any sense—but because of a sense of conscience and a desire to make their contributions to the world. So it feels as though amendment No. 8 is rather old-fashioned; either it is trying to fight the first world war again and deal with how people were treated when they deserted then, or it is trying to fight a war about a debate that was held in the Chamber some time ago.

The final reason why I wholeheartedly oppose the amendment is quite simply that I believe that it would undermine the House. It effectively says that, in some circumstances, a soldier or an officer or a member of the other armed forces could desert, despite the fact that this country, through the House—its elected representatives—had decided that the war was legitimate and legal, and I do not think that we should go down that route.

Mr. MacNeil: The Bill benchmarks draconian penalties for going absent without leave, which could occur in accordance with conscience, owing to the orders that the soldier was given. We must remember that orders vary according to the actions that Governments might want to take as a result of their international alliances. The proposed penalty is the maximum that has been benchmarked in our society. Indeed, if we went back to the days of world war one, we would have the ultimate penalty. Subsection 2(b) refers to someone who "intends to avoid any particular service or kind of service"—

that is the nub of it—because he or she does not agree with the Government of the day. If we go back perhaps to 1930s Germany, a reasonable law could be passed by a reasonable Government—but, years later, we might not have a reasonable Government, and we would still have on the statute book a law that criminalises an awful lot of people.

It is argued by some soldiers that they are entering into forms of bonded labour for a period of years. They volunteer before action; surely, they have the right to volunteer after action and not in any way to be subject to life in prison. We have the concept of just war, and importantly, we have the Nuremberg principles of the 1950s, which placed a responsibility on each person engaged in a war to assess for themselves exactly the orders that they receive.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): This is the second time that the Nuremberg law has come up, and the hon. Gentleman ought to bear in mind the difference between waging an illegal war and doing illegal acts in the course of fighting a war. I do not think that anyone at Nuremberg suggested that any individual German soldier, sailor or airman was guilty of waging an illegal war, although many of them may have been guilty of war crimes in the context of that war, irrespective of whether or not it was legal.

Mr. MacNeil: It is not for me to speak about the legality of Adolf Hitler's war, but it is certainly for me to stand up for soldiers. I have spoken anecdotally to several forces personnel, and it would seem that few of them know much about the rights of conscientious objection. The Bill will set as a benchmark, for going absent without leave, for viewing war as unjust or even for changing one's mind, the penalty of life in prison. As the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) pointed out, desertion has trebled since the Iraq war. The USA has about 6,000 people going AWOL.

5 pm

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am rather confused. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a big difference between people who are forced to go to war as part of a conscription army and people who have taken it upon themselves to make a conscious decision to join Her Majesty's armed forces? Those are two very different situations and it is a mistake to link them.

Mr. MacNeil: We heard earlier the remarkable assertion that it would be impossible for this country ever to engage in an illegal war. It would be possible for this country to engage in an illegal war and, given that that is the case, it is incumbent on individual service personnel to look at exactly what they are involved in. Illegal actions stem from illegal wars.

Mr. Jones: I will put the same question to the hon. Gentleman as I put to my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) earlier. If we were in an unusual situation and the hon. Gentleman became the Defence Minister of either Scotland or the UK, what would he do if this Parliament, or any other Parliament in which he was a representative at that time, decided to take military action? Is he seriously suggesting that individual officers and men would be able to opt out of that democratic decision?

Mr. MacNeil: If I were to become a Defence Minister, it would not be in the UK. My imperialist ambitions are very small—in fact, they are non-existent. Scotland might be a possibility.

Chris Bryant: Stornoway.

Mr. MacNeil: It could be. [Interruption.] Or Rockall. Labour gave that away in one of their first actions on the grounds that it had been plundered by Russian trawlers. Will the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) repeat the question?

Mr. Jones: I am sorry. It obviously made a great impression on the hon. Gentleman. I was asking what would happen in the unlikely event of his becoming the Defence Minister for Scotland or anywhere else that would be sad enough to appoint him. If the body that he was party to—whether it was the Scottish Parliament or any other body—took a democratic decision to invade somewhere or wage a legal war, is he seriously suggesting that individual officers and men, who had not been conscripted but had volunteered to join that nation's armed forces, could have a veto and could pick and choose which military action they joined? Would that not cut across the democratic decision that had been taken?

Mr. MacNeil: I am not saying that there would not be a penalty, but I am saying that there would be no ultimate penalty of life imprisonment. Two years would be quite adequate for somebody who is arguably following their conscience. I pay tribute to Malcolm Kendall-Smith, who is a particular source of admiration to me.

Mr. Flello: As part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, I recently had the opportunity to take part in a dawn attack exercise on Salisbury plain. We were in the back of a Saxon armoured personnel carrier at four o'clock in the morning—albeit on an exercise—and we were reliant on two guys, one on either side of the vehicle, each with a light anti-tank weapon. In a war environment, I would like to know that those guys were there with their light anti-tank weapons defending the vehicle, rather than thinking that they may decide, according to their consciences, at four o'clock in the morning, that it was all a bad idea. What is the hon. Gentleman's view on a squaddie—if I may use that word—lying there with a light anti-tank weapon, thinking to himself, "Two years isn't so bad. Let's slope off home and not lie here at four o'clock in the morning in the cold"?

Mr. MacNeil: The Bill does not say what people hope it says. It refers to life imprisonment for avoiding a service. It does not refer to being on active service. We are not talking about desertion in the heat of battle, but a conscious thought before battle.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman said that the Bill does not refer to active operations, but subsection (3) states:

"In this section 'relevant service' means—

(a) actions or operations against an enemy".

Mr. MacNeil: And subsection (2) states:

"a person deserts if … he intends to avoid any particular service or kind of service".

Perhaps we are dealing with a Bill that is something of a mishmash.

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacNeil: No, I am going to press on.

While we have a system that imposes a maximum penalty of two years for taking action, in the cold light of day, that results in the besmirching of Parliament by selling peerages, we should not allow, in any way, shape or form, servicemen to be threatened with life imprisonment if they follow the 1950 Nuremburg principles and their conscience, and question orders. Clause 8(5)(a) would allow a sentence of life on that very point, but such a benchmark should not be put in statute.

Mr. Simon: I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson), to the Front Bench. He has been an asset to the far end of the Treasury Bench for a long time and is now an adornment on the other end.

I was not in the Committee to hear the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). However, given his experience and the tributes of the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who is no longer in the Chamber, but whose judgment on such matters is impeccable, I am sure that it was a considered and impressive contribution.

I heard the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen). Impressive though his contribution also was, he used several phrases about the Government and the Bill that seemed to apply more to his speech than to the other side of the argument. He described the measure as muddled and talked a lot about cherry-picking. He repeatedly asked, "Who is the enemy?" It struck me that that was an apposite question.

It is a shame that although the supporters of the amendments had the kernel of a reasonable point, they have failed to make it. It was a fair point that, perhaps, the sentence of life imprisonment is a bit draconian for a new Bill for modern armed services. The Committee could have had a reasonable discussion about that point. However, unfortunately, amendment No. 9 does not say, "Life imprisonment is a bit draconian. Let's have a reasonable discussion about what would be a more appropriate and modern sentence for desertion"—which, as the hon. Member for Newark eloquently and movingly explained, is a serious offence. The amendment would reduce the sentence to two years, although that is the same sentence that applies for going absent without leave, which is a completely different offence that is treated with a different kind of seriousness. The amendment thus effectively precludes us from having a reasonable debate on whether the sentence of life imprisonment, even though it is only a maximum sentence that is rarely applied, is, perhaps, rather archaic and somewhat draconian.

Amendment No. 8 could have given us the opportunity to have a reasonable discussion about the offence of desertion and its sentence. However, such a debate has been effectively sacrificed. Although I did not hear the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, the amendment seems to have been used as an opportunistic attempt to drag up again the old debate about the Iraq war, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda said, that has nothing to do with the Bill. Frankly, the amendment has been tabled on a fraudulent prospectus. It is not possible for the nation to go to war illegally.

Jeremy Corbyn: How can my hon. Friend possibly say that a nation cannot go to war illegally? There was no outside attack and there was no UN approval, yet we invaded a country that was not threatening us.

Mr. Simon: This sovereign Parliament having voted to take that action, it becomes, as far as I am concerned, a legal and legitimate undertaking.

Mr. MacNeil: As one of the supporters of the amendment, I was just looking back through the notes for my speech and I do not think that I mentioned Iraq once. The amendment was not about rerunning the issue of the Iraq war; it was about making sure that service personnel are not faced with the draconian penalty of life in prison.

Mr. Simon: I do not think that I mentioned the hon. Member for the Western Isles, if I may call him that, in my remarks about Iraq. I mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead, who it seemed to me spoke about little else than the Iraq war.

It is not possible for this country to engage in an illegal war. Surely it is not practical, reasonable or intelligent to suggest that armed service personnel, on an individual basis, in theatre, should be not only allowed but encouraged to make decisions about whether they are engaged in a legal or an illegal war. That is absurd. Many of my constituents serve in the armed forces and do not have these dilemmas. They are keen, happy and proud to serve. It is not fair to put them in a position where their comrades are encouraged to speculate constantly on whether they should be there, or perhaps, in better conscience, to consider desertion.

Patrick Mercer: I am listening with great interest to the hon. Gentleman, who is making some profound points. Does he accept that if a soldier, a sailor or an airman is suddenly struck by conscience while on duty, there is a system whereby they can go to their platoon sergeant, platoon commander, company sergeant-major, company commander, regimental sergeant-major or commanding officer to represent their views and to say, "I am reluctant to serve"? They do not need to go absent.

Mr. Simon: Exactly. There is a system, and it is of long standing. The hon. Gentleman speaks of it with knowledge and from experience. He spoke equally eloquently about the extraordinary seriousness of the offence of desertion.

All that remains for me to add is to reiterate that there could have been a serious point. I think that we could have had a reasonable argument about whether a maximum sentence of life imprisonment is necessary in a modern army, albeit that that maximum is not mandatory and is rarely applied. I regret that the supporters of the amendment have failed to take that opportunity and instead have chosen to rerun a debate that I do not think there is any point having anywhere any more. Certainly, this Committee and this Bill is not the place for it.

Mr. Hancock: May I first, for the benefit of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), clarify the position as I see it on the Liberal Democrat Benches? We will support the Minister on this issue because we believe that it is the only sensible way that any military force which is made up of volunteers can operate. That is not ambiguous. It is not open to contradiction. It is crystal clear where we stand on the issue.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon). He made the point that a war, or action by our armed forces, is legal when this place—the House—accepts a proposition that we should send our armed forces into harm's way to fight on our behalf. They then have a clear, legitimate duty to uphold what they have signed up to do, which is to fight on our behalf, following a request from a democratically elected Government. Others, me included, may feel that the Government misled the nation on the pretext for going to war. However, that does not excuse members of the armed forces from obeying a direct order from Parliament that puts them in harm's way.

Jeremy Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point. The decision to deploy British troops is made under the royal prerogative. Parliament was consulted by the Prime Minister before we went into what I believe to be an illegal war in Iraq. Surely the issue is the legality in international law, which has not been argued for and has not been sustained in the case of Iraq.

5.15 pm

Mr. Hancock: No one in the international community has made the case that the action taken, with which I did not agree, was illegal. Kofi Annan and others have voiced their opinion, but it is simply an opinion. The Chamber voted, against my wishes, to send our armed forces into harm's way, and they have served with credit to themselves and to the nation. The hon. Members for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) and for Newark (Patrick Mercer) spoke with great eloquence about the issues. It is not a question of whether a life sentence should be imposed for desertion. I should like to know whether the Members who support the amendment know how many members of the armed forces in the past 25 years have stood trial for desertion, how many have been sentenced to life imprisonment and how many have served more than 10 years in prison for the act of desertion. Not a single Member has told us the answer.

Can the Minister tell the House how many of the 250,000 people who have served in our armed forces since we invaded Iraq have cited as their reason for leaving disquiet and discomfort at what they consider to be the illegal actions they were asked to carry out? The House would be interested to know whether there is any evidence to support the claim that a huge phalanx of people have left the Army because they did not like what they were asked to do in Iraq. There are many reasons to be critical of the Government's actions, but I cannot find any in this case.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): I have no reason to doubt what the hon. Gentleman said about the many people who have been charged and given life imprisonment, or even spent 10 years in prison. Why, therefore, in his view, do we need this piece of legislation?

Mr. Hancock: If my children's lives were on the line as the result of an act of cowardice and desertion by one of their colleagues, or if that colleague put their lives at risk with a harmful action, they ought to suffer the full consequences of the law. It is not for me to judge whether they should receive a life sentence or two, five or 10 years' imprisonment—that is for the system to decide.

The hon. Member for Newark spoke about commanding the largest battalion in the country of more than 900 soldiers for two and a half years on two active service deployments. One soldier could have faced court martial for something that could be construed as desertion. If we were on the receiving end when someone deserted their post, and if their action took our lives or the lives of our comrades, would we honestly not expect something more than a slap on the wrist or a two-year sentence for an individual who chose to disregard their responsibilities to the unit, let alone their responsibilities to the country?

The Bill gets it right. Parliament should not allow any ambiguity in the way in which members of the armed forces can interpret their responsibilities, as that would be manifestly unfair to the men and women who daily put their lives on the line. It would be unfair to suggest that they can pick and choose, as they cannot do so. The hon. Member for Newark explained with a great deal of eloquence how the unit would dispense its own version of fair and just punishment if a colleague acted in such a way—although I do not wish to suggest for a minute that that is correct, as military justice should be seen to be fair and should be administered properly.

Members of the armed forces should not be left in any doubt about the consequences of their actions. A sentence that may be for life is exactly that. Every court in the land has discretion in the determination of most sentences. I was concerned about the sentences meted out today to the three men who killed the young black lad in Birmingham last year. The judge recommended 25 years, but I am sure that if I was the parent of that young boy, 25 years would not be anything like long enough. We must judge these things on what we would expect if our sons and daughters were put in harm's way. We must ensure justice for them as much as for anyone else.

Harry Cohen: That sounds very good, but the hon. Gentleman is arguing for an excessive sentence—life—for people who are not putting other people's lives at risk, but in effect declaring the equivalent of a conscientious objection. The core of his opening argument was that if Parliament votes for it, it is all right. He is 150 years out of date. We now have international law and his attitude to that is cavalier, which is surprising, as the Liberals wanted us to be subject to EU law and supported all that EU involvement. Does he not recognise that international law is as important as ordinary law? The Serbian Parliament voted for war and said that if they voted for it, it must be all right. It was not all right.

Mr. Hancock: Once again, the hon. Gentleman is trying to confuse the Committee—but it is he who is wholly confused about the issue. There is nothing in international law that has proven that there are currently, or have been in the past 10 years, British armed forces engaged in an illegal action. No international court anywhere has found any member of the British—[Interruption.] The international court of public opinion is a different matter from the court of law about which the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead speaks. I am not cavalier about it; I am extremely concerned that the men and women who do their duty on behalf of this country know that they have the backing of the country for their actions, and that they are engaged in lawful business.

We have had soldiers in Sierra Leone, Bosnia and several other parts of the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq. I do not believe that a significant number of those wanted to become conscientious objectors. If they had, we would know about it. We have a clear indication from the Library of the number of members of the armed forces who have sought to become conscientious objectors. We would also know because we regularly meet members of the armed forces.

I met somebody who was decorated for bravery during the past five years. He did not agree with what the Government had asked him to do, but went and did his duty, knowing in his heart that he did not believe that it was the right thing to do. He was a member of the armed forces and, in his view, he was not in a position to cherry-pick the missions that he served on. He did his duty. He could, as he said to me, have opted to leave the armed forces, but he chose not to do so. He chose to do his duty.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) said, in the one part of his speech with which I did not have some sympathy, that when the history of what has happened is written, the real heroes will be those who refused to fight the war. That does a great disservice to the men and women who are daily putting their lives on the line for this country.

John McDonnell: The hon. Gentleman will recall that throughout my speech I paid tribute to the servicemen who are currently serving, for their courage and dedication. I do not want that comment undermined.

Mr. Hancock: I agree entirely, but the hon. Gentleman also said that the real heroes will be those who chose to exercise their right not to go. I believe that that is a mistaken view that does no justice to the men and women whom he praised and whom all of us, I hope, support.

Alan Simpson: May I try and unravel some of the confusion that has run through the debate? The debate on amendment No. 9 in particular is not about whether there should be an offence of desertion, or whether there should be specific, defined parameters for the punishments. It is about the nature of the parameters, rather than about the existence of the offence.

Mr. Simon: That is true of amendment No. 9, but not of amendment No. 8, which specifically concerns the nature of the offence.

Alan Simpson: True, but I want to deal with issues that we need to view as distinct segments. One concerns whether there should be an offence that relates to the disobeying of orders to serve in what is defined in the Bill as "the occupation of a foreign country or territory."

The point was made that it is not possible for such an occupation or war to be illegal if the Government of the day have made the democratic decision that it is a legal and justifiable war, but that is deeply wrong. International law and the United Nations and its conventions define the distinction between the circumstances in which a war is unavoidable and the circumstances in which a country has the right to defend itself. But it is not true that any Parliament in any country can make a war legal, and that includes our own Parliament, just because it decides that it should be legal. In the case of the Serbian Parliament's decisions in respect of the war on Bosnia, we said consistently that we did not care that the Serbian Parliament had decided that it was a legal war for its own purposes; that was not the view of the international community. It is deeply dangerous for any Parliament to go down a path that says that if it decides that a war is legal, that makes it legal. That is not the framework set by the international community on the legality of international wars after the second world war.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman not understand that we are going down a long avenue of irrelevance here? This is a question of military discipline; it is not a matter of decision as to the merits or demerits, or the legality or illegality, of a particular war, or his perception of it.

Alan Simpson: I accept that, but I am saying that the argument about a war being legal just because we say it is legal is a dangerous path for this Committee to be led down, and it is not relevant to amendment No. 9. What is relevant is to question the legitimacy of the House setting a parameter of life imprisonment to the penalties for a refusal to obey an order in relation to desertion, when the guidance notes say:

"the maximum is life imprisonment if the offender deserts when on service, or under orders to go on service".

The question is whether it should be appropriate in this day and age, in this Bill, which the House is passing now for the foreseeable future, to retain a life imprisonment parameter for a refusal to go on service.

Bob Russell: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that his maximum would be two years, and thus with good behaviour it could be as little as one year, on a maximum sentence?

Alan Simpson: My maximum at this point just removes life imprisonment. I have no doubt that if the Committee agrees the amendment, the other place will send the legislation back with further amendments defining a more comprehensive and appropriate framework, and I have no objection to that. The point is that the Committee should express a view about whether we are willing just to nod through a presumption that the rationalisation of existing sentencing powers should be the maximum limit of life imprisonment, and it is important that the Committee should say no on that.

Mr. Simon: Whether one takes that point or not surely the problem is that the amendment does not account for the other end of the spectrum; it does not make the distinction between the much less serious offence of going absent without leave and the much more serious offence of desertion. In giving the same penalty for absence without leave and desertion, the amendment completely fails as a piece of law to make a very important distinction. Regardless of what happens at the top, what about what happens at the bottom?

Alan Simpson: My hon. Friend has made the case for a graduated tariff. I am questioning the presumption that the range of the tariff should automatically include as an upper limit life imprisonment for a refusal to obey an order to go on service.

5.30 pm

I want to discuss the case of Flight-Lieutenant Kendall-Smith, which has already been mentioned, and the trial of Major Florian Pfaff in Germany in 2004. The key point is the right of individuals to challenge the legitimacy and the legality of orders given to them. I do not for one moment assume that in an army manned by volunteers any of the young men and women who volunteer do so in a fly-by-night way, which is a deeply disrespectful presumption. When people decide to give themselves an extended weekend, the circumstances are different from when people consciously decide that they are no longer prepared to serve in a particular conflict or occupation. I accept that such people must face the consequences of their actions within a disciplinary court process, but I want this Committee at least to consider the options and their limitations.

Patrick Mercer: At the risk of sounding like a stuck record, I must point out that the hon. Gentleman has neglected to understand that we have regular volunteer forces which are frequently on operations. Almost everyone I know in the forces spends up to six months every year away on operations. Everybody understands that if they have a moral difficulty with the orders that they have been given, they can represent their views to their commanders in a responsible way. Those who choose to let down their comrades by simply going absent and then deserting need to be discouraged, and we need a serious tariff to deter them.

Alan Simpson: I do not have a problem with a serious tariff. My problem is that the Bill states that the maximum sentence for desertion in the context of a refusal to obey an order to go on service may be life imprisonment, which exceeds the bounds of reasonableness. If one were to step outside this House and this country, one would find that our European partners do not impose anything like the range of tariff penalties enshrined in the Bill.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Notwithstanding my hon. Friend's argument, with which I disagree, he has admitted that his amendment is flawed, because it does not offer an alternative to a two-year sentence, and he hopes that another amendment will be introduced in another place to resolve that matter. Does he agree that that is a dangerous precedent for the Committee to adopt?

Alan Simpson: Sadly, poorly thought-through legislation is increasingly driven through this House, which leaves another place to tidy up by using its common sense, so this would not be the first occasion on which that had happened.

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned our European partners. Those among our European partners who are transferring from a conscript army to a professional army are rewriting their military law, and the French, the Spanish and the Italians are all introducing legislation similar to the Armed Forces Bill. If he were to check, he would find that the penalty for desertion in the French army is a life sentence.

Alan Simpson: Let me come back to the hon. Gentleman with the current information about penalties and figures. As regards his comments about Labour Members not coming up with figures about the sentencing of those tried and imprisoned for desertion, that is not for lack of trying. Some of us have been trying for several weeks to get that information out of the Ministry of Defence or the Library, but it has not been possible to obtain it. I understand from some of my hon. Friends that members of the Defence Committee also tried to obtain it but were unable to do so. That is not an act of negligence on the part of those who are trying to make a different case.

One of the things that was distinctly different in relation to the trial of Major Florian Pfaff in Germany was that although he and other members of the armed forces had to go through the court martial, at the end of that process they had a right to appeal to a civil court. The civil court overturned the court martial judgment on the major that resulted initially in his demotion. The arguments that he used were entirely about whether some of the orders that he was given were illegal orders relating to the preparation of weapons systems for use in the war on Iraq. Even the German civil courts were unable to question that, but they were able to rule on whether the major clearly, legitimately and conscientiously held those views. On that basis, they ruled in his favour.

Nothing of that type is proposed for inclusion in this framework for our own armed forces. When Flight Lieutenant Malcolm Kendall-Smith attempted to use similar arguments about refusing to serve in Iraq, believing that the orders were illegal, he was told that he was not allowed to have that considered because the Attorney-General had ruled that it was legal. He was not allowed to ask whether the Attorney-General had made that ruling before he knew that there were no weapons of mass destruction, that no uranium was coming into Iraq for enrichment, or that there was no prospect of the UK being under threat and targeted within 45 minutes. None of that was challengeable.

We should be using this opportunity to open out the legitimacy of rights to contest decisions and orders. That particularly concerns me in relation to the provisions on refusal to serve in an occupation, which refer not to a legal occupation but merely to an occupation. Members who say that that is not specific to Iraq or to any particular existing conflict are right. We need to be clear about our interpretation of this. Are we saying that irrespective of whether a conflict is legal, a refusal to serve should carry with it the prospect of a sentence of life imprisonment?

Mr. Watson: The definitions are very important. Refusal to go on active service—that is, refusing an order—carries a 10-year sentence. Desertion—that is, abandoning one's colleagues—can carry a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Refusing to go to Iraq counts as disobeying orders, and the maximum penalty is only 10 years.

Alan Simpson: I confess that we have had some interesting discussions on the Labour Benches about the interpretation of different clauses. It is clear that even those who support the wording as it stands recognise that there is considerable scope for confusion in interpreting the provisions. The guidance notes do not necessarily support what the Under-Secretary says. The Government have several opportunities in the Bill's remaining stages to table amendments to clarify the matter. However, it is important that we recognise the rights of serving men and women in the conflicts in which we have placed them. The point at which one crosses from legality to illegality is far from clear.

We currently say that the occupation of Iraq is under a legal mandate of the United Nations. However, what do we do when, following the recent incidents in Basra—the part of Iraq in which the United Kingdom is operational—Mohammad al-Waili, the Governor of Basra, said that British security control prevented the provincial government from purging the security forces of militia members? That was evidenced by the fact that Iraqi security forces had to defend UK troops against attacks by Iraqi civilians. It is understandable that serving personnel in those circumstances start to question the point when we cross from a legal mandate to an illegal occupation.

Our proposal does not give people a get-out-of-jail card. It does not mean that they can take whatever action they like, depending on the state of the weather or whether they have a hangover. We are considering whether there is a tariff system for the available punishments in the armed forces that relates to the current duties of our serving men and women and makes sense to the general public.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I shall shortly lose the will to live. My hon. Friend keeps trying to move the goalposts. On whether occupation is illegal, I accept that there are differing views about Iraq. However, it was said earlier that UK troops are there under a UN mandate. If my hon. Friend wants to provide circumstances whereby people can pick and choose their interpretation of that UN mandate, he gives them a get-out-of-jail card and carte blanche to do what they want. That cannot happen in organised armed forces.

Harry Cohen rose—

Alan Simpson: I am tempted to start my reply, but I am conscious that another hon. Friend wants to intervene, so I shall deal with both points at the same time.

Harry Cohen: I want to pick up the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary made in the context of legality and illegality and about who constitutes the enemy, which is defined in clause 367. The Under-Secretary said that the enemy was anyone who fires at us and that desertion applies only if someone leaves a conflict. However, many thousands of people, including women and children, are killed in air raids. They would not be classified as enemies under the Bill or the Under-Secretary's classification of anyone who fires at us. If a soldier discovers illegality—although it may be termed collateral damage—has not he a right to say that he wants to opt out of that, claim a conscientious objection and not be punished with life imprisonment?

Alan Simpson: I do not want to be trapped into trying to define the point at which an action is legal or illegal, or the tariff system that should follow a refusal to serve in specific circumstances.

I believe that we must step back and provide that it is wrong to have a carte blanche presumption that the upper limit of the sentencing range should be life imprisonment. Those who are killed in modern wars are primarily not other soldiers. The second world war was probably the turning point in that regard. In modern wars, there is much more collateral damage—that is the modern phrase; it really means civilian casualties—than killing of combatants. It is therefore perfectly legitimate that our serving personnel should have a right and a duty to exercise their judgment about the point at which the threshold is crossed. That does not meant that they should walk away from their decisions with no consequences, but we need to define different parameters.

5.45 pm

I would like to tell the Committee about the parameters that exist elsewhere. In Austria, the maximum sentence for desertion is one year; in practice, it is usually between two and six months. In France, desertion in peacetime is punishable by up to three years' imprisonment—

Mr. Kevan Jones: It is two years, is it not?

Alan Simpson: The notes say that it is three years.

In Germany, desertion is punishable by up to five years' imprisonment, although deserters who return to their unit within a month may be sentenced for up to three years. In the Netherlands, desertion in peacetime can be punished by a maximum of two years' imprisonment. In wartime, the punishment is a maximum of seven and a half years' imprisonment. In Poland, refusal to perform military service or to carry out a task inherent in such service is punishable by a range of sentences, from six months to five years' imprisonment, or up to three years in wartime. That is the tariff system that is applied by other countries in the EU, and against which we ought to be measuring the revision of our own armed forces legislation.

Mr. Jones: That is exactly what the Bill is doing. At the moment, the maximum penalty for desertion is life imprisonment. Clause 8 will bring that down to a sentence of up to two years for general desertion—that is, desertion in peacetime or from a UK base—and up to life imprisonment for deserting when deployed on operational duties. So we are changing the law, and it will be better than the tariff that my hon. Friend has just cited for France, for example.

Alan Simpson: I would be happy for the Government to come back with a proposal for an improvement on the French system—

Mr. Jones: It is in the Bill.

Alan Simpson: Clause 8 does not represent an improvement on the French system. It will mean that officers serving on the front line who can see at first hand what is happening—unlike us, who simply have to read the reports that are presented to us here—could face substantial charges. It is incumbent on the House to say that such charges are inappropriate to the world in which modern warfare is being conducted, and to the expectations and rights of those young men and women who have volunteered to put their lives on the line in the service of this country.

Let us take a step back from the debate for a moment. Over the past couple of weeks, there has been a huge fuss about the Home Office releasing people who have a track record of murder or rape. People who have committed criminal offences such as those can get early release from prison. To enshrine in the Bill the prospect of life imprisonment for a refusal to kill seems to make a nonsense of the ethical responsibilities that Britain should be carrying in the modern world.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): We have debated this matter for about an hour and a half, and I am bound to say that Eric Forth would have approved of Parliament holding the Government to account in this way. I therefore make no complaint about the time taken to discuss these matters. Indeed, we have had an extremely good debate.

I should like to pay particular tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), who undoubtedly brings real experience to the House and is prepared to share it with us. We should not take his advice lightly. I should also like to pay tribute to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who is unfortunately not in his place at the moment. This was perhaps the only time that I have entirely agreed with everything that he said. That will probably do him more damage than me, but still—

I also salute the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) for his interventions. Both he and the hon. Member for Rhondda demonstrated the value of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, whose tie I happen to be wearing today, in case the Minister had not noticed. Their contributions, as well as those of others who did not mention that they had taken part in the armed forces parliamentary scheme, illustrate the great benefit that that scheme brings not only to Members of the House but to the armed forces.

I also welcome the Minister to his new position and congratulate him on his post. He has had something of a baptism of fire in having to deal straight away with a 300-clause Bill, which has a huge amount of detail. We wish him well, and I am trying to assist him. Clearly, the fire is coming at him from his Benches rather than from the Liberal Democrat Benches, and it is certainly not coming from the Conservative Benches.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Red on red.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position that the nature of the fire is red on red.

Bob Russell: As the hon. Gentleman has welcomed the new Minister, will he join me in paying tribute to the previous Minister, who piloted the Bill for four months? I am led to believe that he was about to make that point, and I am sure that I shall endorse what he was going to say in criticising the Prime Minister for sacking the previous Minister.

Mr. Howarth: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell), who represents another important garrison town—almost as important as Aldershot—for mentioning that point. Having welcomed the Minister, I was indeed going to pay tribute to his predecessor, the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), with whom I have had an extremely interesting and constructive debate on the Bill. I thank him for the efforts that he made to ensure that we were as well briefed as we could be on the implications of the Bill, and I salute him for that. As this is a moment of salutations, I also thank the Bill team, whose presence we are not allowed to acknowledge in the Chamber, but no doubt the message will get to them that they have also been extremely helpful in relation to getting this legislation right, which is of great concern to all Members of the House.

On the amendment, I also pay tribute to how well the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) moved it, with great dignity and honour, save for the slight disagreement drawn to our attention by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), on which I think that he is right. Nevertheless, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington made his case in a coherent and restrained way.

It is claimed that the desertion clause has been rewritten to punish those who refuse to serve in Iraq with life imprisonment. The amendment seeks to remove "occupation of a foreign country" from the categories of desertion, and removes the punishment of life imprisonment for the most serious classifications of desertion. The desertion clause has not been rewritten to cover those who refuse to take part in the occupation of Iraq, as I am sure that the Minister will also tell the House. It does not increase the punishment for desertion to life imprisonment; it reduces the maximum penalty for most desertion cases by reintroducing a two-tier classification of desertion that takes us back to the position under the 1955 Act, as the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) pointed out. That Act included two tiers of desertion. Less serious forms of desertion, including desertion while in the UK, were punishable with a sentence of up to two years' imprisonment; the more serious form, desertion while on active service, carried a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Occupation of a foreign country was included in that more serious form, and the hon. Member for Rhondda pointed out the importance of having that provision in the Bill.

In 1971, new armed forces legislation amended the desertion offence and ended the two-tier punishment for desertion, counting all forms of desertion together, with a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. The reason for that change was the situation in Northern Ireland, which, as Northern Ireland is in the United Kingdom, was not covered by the definition of active service. However, desertion to avoid serving in the Province was considered just as serious as desertion to avoid active service. Little changed in the everyday application of the punishment for desertion, and the punishment continued to reflect the seriousness of the offence.

Therefore, the Bill merely reinstates the two-tier provisions of the earlier Act. It includes a lower tier of less serious forms of desertion, with a maximum sentence of up to two years, and includes the equivalent of desertion while on active service, with a maximum punishment of life imprisonment. The only difference between that and the earlier Act is that the Government have removed the term "active service". They have included the provisions and definition of active service from the 1955 Act in the Bill. The Government have therefore reduced, not increased, the maximum sentence for the lower forms of desertion. They have taken the armed forces back to the position under the 1955 Act. They have not included foreign occupation because of Iraq; it is nonsense for the awkward squad to make that claim. Desertion while occupying a foreign country has had a punishment of up to life imprisonment for the past 50 years.

Mention has been made of two high-profile recent cases. The first was that of Flight Lieutenant Kendall-Smith. He was jailed for refusing a direct order. He was punished not for his conscientious objection but for his failure to obey an order. He was court-martialled for disobeying a direct order to report for pre-deployment training. His claim that he was acting on principle has no legal basis, and his sentence rightly reflects that.

However, Ben Griffin, the SAS conscientious objector, did not refuse a direct order, and nor did he desert. While he was on leave, he told his commanding officer of his objections to the war and, through the existing procedures, left the Army. That was a perfectly honourable course of action for a volunteer soldier to take. He decided that, in all conscience, he could not obey the order. The hon. Member for North Durham is again right that this country is extremely fortunate that those who make up our armed forces are not automatons but have a highly attuned sense of morality and are extremely sensible and decent people. Mr. Griffin took a principled decision. He did not make the fuss that the chap in the Royal Air Force made.

Mr. MacNeil: On a small point, Ben Griffin's words and reasons were:

"I didn't join the British Army to conduct American foreign policy".

Mr. Howarth: Whatever his reasons were, he took an appropriate course of action that was open to him and ceased to be a soldier without all the grandstanding that Flight Lieutenant Kendall-Smith undertook. He proved that somebody who has a conscience and feels that that military service, which he was commanded to undertake, was incorrect, has a means to avoid that without all the histrionics and without breaking the law. That is what Ben Griffin did.

Harry Cohen: Ben Griffin also told The Sunday Telegraph that he had witnessed dozens of illegal acts by US fighters who viewed Iraqis as "sub-human". He said:

"I saw a lot of things in Baghdad that were illegal or just wrong."

The hon. Gentleman places great emphasis on desertion while on active service, and saying that that warrants the highest sentence is almost like an ultimatum. Ben Griffin talked about the Americans, but if someone witnesses in their troop such illegal acts and civilians being killed—not enemies, but what we call collateral damage—what is the remedy, if they are not to take part in such acts, other than to desert? Surely the hon. Gentleman's distinction is a false one.

Mr. Howarth: There is a whole system of military law that is designed to ensure that those who break the law in the fashion that the hon. Gentleman sets out are brought to account. Indeed, a number of cases are currently before the authorities for that precise reason. With that intervention, I am afraid that he blows his case straight out of the water.

Serving in Iraq is neither immoral nor illegal. As the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) said, that war and the subsequent deployment there are illegal under neither United Kingdom nor international law. The deployment in Iraq is supported by United Nations resolutions, and the Attorney-General has reported that the United Kingdom's actions in Iraq are not illegal.

Let me remind the Committee of an interesting moment, when the Chief of the Defence Staff—then Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, now Lord Boyce—specifically asked on behalf of every serviceman and servicewoman under his command—that is, everyone in uniform—whether the war was legal. He obtained that assurance from the Government. He was right to obtain it on behalf of all who served in Her Majesty's armed forces, and from that time onwards every person in Her Majesty's armed forces was protected.

Perhaps the Minister will be able to confirm that it is unlikely that the maximum sentence would ever be imposed, and that the most serious punishments would relate to desertion from one's post and putting the lives of one's comrades in danger in the way described by my hon. Friend the Member for Newark. I am sure we all agree that it is absolutely right and proper for us to ensure tonight that in such cases a suitable punishment is available. It would be a dereliction of our duty to protect our armed forces if we removed the possibility of life imprisonment for desertion in the circumstances outlined by my hon. Friend and alluded to by others. I therefore hope that the Committee will reject the amendment and support the Bill as it stands.

Mr. Watson: I thank the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) for his kind words. I must say that when I walked into the Chamber and saw the massed ranks of the socialist Campaign group of Labour Members ready to do battle, for a split second I felt like deserting my own post—but my commanding officer sitting on my left, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, stiffened my resolve, as he would then have had to respond to the debate.

The debate has been very informative. The speech that I will pick out is that of the hon. Member for Newark, which was incredibly well informed and orotund; the argument moved on much further following his contribution. It has been a debate about definitions, and I am anxious to clear up the misunderstandings over the changes that we have made to the offence of desertion.

Clause 8 preserves the offence of desertion, but makes two important changes to the existing offence. I shall describe them in a moment. Under the clause, a serviceman deserts by absenting himself with the intention of never returning to duty, or by absenting himself in order to avoid relevant service. "Relevant service" is defined as "actions or operations against an enemy…operations outside the British Islands for the protection of life or property; or…military occupations of a foreign country or territory".

The definition essentially reflects the definition of active service in the current service discipline Acts. Those are the most critical and potentially hazardous duties for service personnel, so the offence is all the more serious when the intention or effect of the serviceman's actions is to avoid that relevant service.

Amendment No. 8 seeks to redefine "relevant service" to exclude operations outside the British Islands for the protection of property or military occupation of a foreign country or territory. Amendment No. 9 seeks to reduce the maximum sentence for desertion to two years' imprisonment in all cases—equivalent to the maximum sentence for absence without leave, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Newark.

I listened to the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), and I think that they were put honestly and coherently, but, frankly, I disagree with him. Under existing provisions, the definition of desertion refers to going absent with the intention of never returning to duty, going absent to avoid any service overseas, or going absent to avoid service when before an enemy. All those attract a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

[Mr. Watson]

That definition includes going absent to avoid a posting to Germany, training in Canada or a detachment to Cyprus, as well as the types of relevant service that I have described, simply because it involves service overseas. Under the existing law, if a soldier avoids a short posting to Germany with his unit because he is having trouble with his girlfriend and wants to sort things out, he is in theory guilty of desertion—carrying a maximum sentence of life imprisonment—even if he intends to return to duty.

Our first change is to restrict the offence to exclude that unfairness. It will not cover any service overseas, only relevant service. Our second change is to reduce the current maximum sentence of life imprisonment to a maximum of two years, except when desertion is to avoid relevant service. Under the current law, the maximum is life imprisonment in all cases.

Members will appreciate that the operations involved in "relevant service" are of the greatest importance. When such operations are involved, every member of the forces must have complete confidence in the other members of his unit, not least because the operations are dangerous and demanding. Those who avoid such service increase the danger to their colleagues, and damage morale. In a disciplined fighting force, that is totally unacceptable.

Even in the days of compulsory military service, the law reflected the particular seriousness of avoiding such service. It is, if anything, even more serious in a professional volunteer armed force for there to be a distinction between types of dangerous service of the kind proposed by my hon. Friend.

I hope that I have explained to my hon. Friend what we are trying to do in clause 8. I hope he will accept that the scope and definition of the offence is new but far less severe than it was before, and that the true position is the reverse of what he has asserted.

John McDonnell: I was expecting a brief debate, as clause 8 is one of nearly 300 clauses, but I am pleased with the level of the debate in which we have engaged. I want to focus on the constructive elements that we can take from it. For the record, I also want to establish clarity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) said that amendment No. 8 was old-fashioned, relating to the first world war rather than to modern military service. The Bill was intended to be a modernising piece of legislation. What concerned me was that it translated the life sentence threat from existing legislation on sanctions to the new legislation.

I accept the pedantic—no, the constructive—point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) that the reintroduction of the two-year limit gives us some flexibility. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) said, it moves us towards a graduated tariff approach. I agree with him that we could have had a better debate about that. The debate on clause 8 did not feature in the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee, and has not arisen in the House until now.

My first objection to the clause is that it is not modernising legislation; it simply translates the life sentence from earlier legislation. As for my second objection, I respect the views that have been expressed—along with many others today, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) for bringing to the Chamber his professional experiences on the ground—but we should look again at the process for dealing with conscientious objection. The process that the hon. Gentleman described, as he has seen it, is not the process described in the evidence submitted to the Committee by the successor to the original consultative body, the Peace Pledge Union, which is meant to advise the Government on these matters. Its view is that the conscientious objection process as it stands is not accessible, does not give adequate information to individuals who wish to gain access to it, and therefore undermines the process overall.

The third issue, on which there is some agreement across the Committee, is the issue of severity. I think there is a general view that life imprisonment is currently the exception. I thought that we heard earlier from the Liberal Democrats that they did not support the inclusion in this clause of the sanction of life imprisonment. I should be grateful for clarification.

Nick Harvey: I said at the start of the debate that in almost no circumstances could I envisage life imprisonment being a suitable penalty. I agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon), who said earlier that we should have debated a provision that brought the life sentence punishment down to an intermediate level. Had there been such a provision, I could have supported it, but as we have heard, the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington would shift us toward a two-year sentence.

John McDonnell: Best to end when one is winning. The message for the Government is that a significant body of Members in Committee, regardless of party, believe that life imprisonment is a disproportionate sanction in such cases. [Interruption.] I said that a significant body agree; there will of course be others who disagree. I am not asking for consensus—yet.

The discussion has centred on the argument that this is a modern, volunteer and professional Army. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham said that if it was a conscript Army, that would be a different matter altogether and life imprisonment most probably would not be appropriate. There is no difference between us, and if we ever move toward a conscript Army, we will need to debate the matter, because I agree that such a sentence would not be appropriate. However, a modern, volunteer, professional Army should not be motivated by fear of the sanction of life imprisonment, either.

This legislation fails to show a modern understanding of why people desert. They desert because of fear or trauma, or out of conscience, and we should accept that. We should not penalise them with life imprisonment; we should accept that it is a disproportionate sanction, not the appropriate one.

It has been argued that we cannot allow individual soldiers to exercise a right of veto over action, but the reverse is the case.

Mr. MacNeil rose—

John McDonnell: Let me finish this point. In human rights legislation, we require individual soldiers to exercise their own judgment as a duty. Mention has been made of Nuremberg, but this was an issue before then, and it goes well beyond Nuremberg. There is a duty placed on each of us, as individuals in a democratic society—but in particular on soldiers and members of the military—to exercise judgment about whether what we do is right and lawful. I reiterate the point that, whatever debates take place in this or any other Parliament, they do not override that individual duty.

Amendment No. 8 clarifies the situation concerning military occupation. More importantly, amendment No. 9 emphasises the fact that life imprisonment is a disproportionate sentence that does not relate to the reality of a modern Army—an Army that is based upon volunteers and professionals, and which, as we all agree, is in most instances motivated by moral courage. Such an Army should not be motivated by, or threatened by, fear of such a sanction. On that basis, I shall press amendment No. 9 to a Division. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 9, in page 5, line 18, leave out from 'offence' to 'must' in line 20.—[John McDonnell.]

Clause 8 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 9 to 34 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 35

Annoyance by Flying

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

6.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I want to raise a small technical point that has arisen since our lengthy discussions in the Select Committee. I want to express some of my concerns, and those of others involved in flying activity, about the clause. The provision states:

"A person subject to service law commits an offence if...he flies an aircraft so as to annoy or be likely to annoy any person."

We can all conceive of a great many people who would consider any form of flying as an annoyance, so the number of prosecutions could be extensive. In the Select Committee, I was assured that no such prosecution would lie unless the conditions set out in paragraphs (b) and (c) of subsection (1) applied, in particular that the person flew recklessly or intentionally to annoy.

It is important that the Royal Air Force has protection for its low-flying training, which is critical so that our pilots can be trained to carry out the operations that they have undertaken with such spectacular and conspicuous gallantry and effectiveness. If they cannot fly low without the risk of arraignment, the provisions are not right. I am assured by people well-versed technically in such matters that RAF pilots are safe.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): They are safe from prosecution.

Mr. Howarth: We have it from the lips of the Secretary of State so I hope that message will go out to all RAF pilots—

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): And the Fleet Air Arm.

Patrick Mercer: And the Army Air Corps.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed. I can assure my hon. Friend that I am about to speak at greater length about the Army Air Corps.

An ex-military aviator—a soldier of 35 years' standing, who is now the airfield manager at Middle Wallop, but has 5,000 hours as a helicopter pilot in the Army Air Corps—has drawn to my attention an anomaly in paragraph (b), which deals with punishments. An officer guilty of causing an annoyance by flying can be punished only by loss of seniority or by a fine, but a non-commissioned officer may be sentenced to two years' imprisonment. As many Members know, the pilots of the Army Air Corps are predominantly NCOs, as was the case in the RAF during the second world war, although not nowadays. It has been suggested that the penalty for a proven offence may discriminate against NCOs in the Army Air Corps. Can the Minister comment on that? I realise that that may be difficult as he is new to his post.

Mr. Watson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his eagle-eyed egalitarianism. Perhaps I could describe the clause, which preserves a long-standing offence whose effect remains unchanged. It operates where a service pilot flies an aircraft in such a way that he annoys, or is likely to annoy, any person but he could reasonably have avoided doing so. Intent, recklessness or negligence by the pilot in relation to the annoyance caused must also be proved.

Unlike the offence of low flying, the annoyance offence can be committed where the pilot is flying the aircraft in accordance with regulations and in an authorised flight plan. For example, the last RAF prosecution, which was in 1996, involved a pilot who was authorised to fly low in a particular area. He flew over his parents' house several times, allegedly, and understandably, causing annoyance to their neighbours. The offence is considered to serve a valuable purpose in deterring such conduct, which might bring the services into disrepute with the general public.

I recognise the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. If it is an issue, perhaps we can revisit it in another place if we have to do so.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the Minister for that sympathetic view. He said that in addition to the annoyance there has to be an intentionally reckless or negligent aspect. It is important that it is understood that those conditions must apply, too.

I am grateful to the Minister for his willingness to look at the point relating to the Army Air Corps. Perhaps it could be considered when the Bill goes to another place.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 35 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 36

Inaccurate certification

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The clause deals with the inaccurate certification of equipment. We are concerned that the Government have not looked adequately at the discrepancy in the application of the offence between the Navy and the RAF on the one hand and the Army on the other. The Bill makes it an offence to certify inaccurately naval and air force equipment but not Army equipment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key), who raised that point in the Select Committee, apologises for not being at the debate. He is not in the Chamber for good and bad reasons; the good reason is that he has had the operation that he has wanted for many months. I am sure that all Members will wish him a speedy recovery and highly increased mobility. I suspect that he may be watching our proceedings, so we can convey those good wishes instantly.

In the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), then the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, said that my hon. Friend had made an important point. The hon. Gentleman said:

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

"I am conscious of the fact that I have not really answered it sufficiently well."—[Official Report, Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, 20 March 2006; c. 37.]

He clearly wanted to hand that task to the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson) as an opening coup, so that he could deliver some satisfaction to the Opposition. I hope that the Minister will consider that point.

If we do not encompass Army equipment as well, someone who fails to certify an air-to-ground missile accurately could be put on a charge, but someone who fails to certify a ground-to-air missile adequately would not have committed an offence. It is a small point; but, none the less, as we are reviewing all the legislation in this respect, we ought to take the opportunity to try to sort it out if that is necessary.

Mr. Watson: Yes, I read the transcript of that debate, and it is something of an ankle pass. Let me describe the clause. It will preserve the offence that is contained in the service discipline Acts. The offence is committed where a person who is subject to service law makes or signs a relevant certificate without ensuring its accuracy. It is not necessary that the certificate contains a mistake; it is sufficient that a person makes or signs it without ensuring its accuracy. The purpose of the offence is to promote a systematic and thorough approach to safety checks. A relevant certificate is one that relates to any matter that affects the seagoing or fighting efficiency of any of Her Majesty's ships or one that relates to any of Her Majesty's aircraft or any aircraft material.

In relation to aircraft and aircraft material, there is no equivalent to the seagoing or fighting efficiency test that is applied to ships, because ships fulfil a wider role than aircraft, such as providing domestic accommodation for naval personnel. As a result, many checks connected with a ship are the subject of certification but are not safety-related. It would not be appropriate to catch such wider, non-vital checks under this offence, which is intended to promote and ensure safety. Given the particular role played by aircraft, all certificates produced in relation to them and their material fulfil a safety function.

To turn to the point about land-based vehicles that was made by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), the clause will not extend to other land-based types of equipment. Safety, promoted by a system of regular checks, is clearly very important in relation to such equipment. However, the implications of inaccurate certification in respect of ships, aircraft and aircraft material are viewed by all three services as being so crucial that a specific and separate offence continues to be merited.

Mr. Howarth: There is a hint of complacency in that answer, especially as I raised the issue of missile technology. Let us take, for example, a Rapier battery or a multiple-launch rocket system. Those are very complex bits of kit, and they can do just as much damage as a missile launched from an aircraft. As an aviator, I understand the importance of accurate certification of aircraft and their components and, to a certain extent, naval vessels, but there is a clear case that some of the equipment that the Army has in its arsenal today is of equal sophistication and equal lethality, and the result of the inadequate or negligent maintenance of that equipment can be just as devastating as negligence in respect of naval and RAF equipment. So I should like to ask the Minister to look at that again. Given that we are reviewing the whole law that relates to military discipline, I can see no case to leave out the Army. I am afraid that I am not persuaded by what the Minister has said. I do not intend to press the clause to a vote, but I am not really convinced at the moment.

6.45 pm

Mr. Watson: I take on board what has been said by the hon. Member for Aldershot. I read the transcript of the debate in the Select Committee, and as my predecessor undertook, I took the issue back to the Department, which felt that the consequences of incorrectly maintaining an aeroplane part could be catastrophic, so it merited an extra offence. However, I understand the point that he makes; I will take it back and talk to the three services.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the Minister for doing that, and on that basis, I am happy not to push the clause to a vote.

Clause 36 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 37 to 53 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Clause 54

CHARGES WHICH MAY BE HEARD SUMMARILY ONLY WITH PERMISSION OR BY SENIOR OFFICER

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Harry Cohen: Clause 54 relates to some of the other clauses that we have dealt with, but it gives me the opportunity to ask about children in the armed forces, by which I mean those under the age of 18 and how they will be dealt with under the Bill. We have just considered offences that may be dealt with at summary hearing. Indeed, clause 50 deals with the jurisdiction of a court martial. Clause 54 deals with charges that may be heard summarily only with permission or by a senior officer, and some of those charges will apply to the category that I have referred to—children.

International law—in particular, article 1 of the convention on the rights of the child, which entered into force in 1990, states:

"For the purposes of the present Convention, a child means every human being below the age of eighteen years unless under the law applicable to the child, majority is attained earlier."

We are one of the 192 countries that have signed that treaty, which came into force in May 2000, and we ratified the protocol on 24 June 2003. That protocol sets 18 as the minimum age for direct participation in hostilities, and my first question is whether that is the case with under-18s in our armed forces. Can they be involved hostilities? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I want to get a clear answer on that, because it has an important impact not just on an earlier debate but on the way that under-18s are treated. Presumably, if the hon. Members who shouted no are right, under-18s will not be subject to clause 54, which is all about being dealt with summarily by a senior officer. However, I should like to hear an explanation of that.

Before under-18s come into the armed forces, parental consent is supposed to be obtained from parents or legal guardians. Consent must be given freely by the youth and the parent or legal guardian, but are there any special arrangements for orphans or those who have been in care, or are they not accepted into the armed forces? I should like an answer in that respect.

My next point—I want to make four points in all, and this is my third—is whether there is complete equivalence between the way that under-18s are dealt with under court martial arrangements and in civilian criminal courts. I should like to get an explanation of that, because it is important that there should be a degree of equivalence. I note that there can be a period of detention and training followed by a period of supervision and I welcome that. That should be under the auspices of the armed forces. However, there is a quirky bit in the law. The Library tells me that if an offender breaches his or her supervision requirements upon release from custody, that can be dealt with only by a civil court, not a service court. I wonder why that quirky element exists. If the supervision is laid down by a court martial, it should be undertaken by the same people. They seem the obvious people to undertake that supervision. The Library also tells me that there are arrangements for those under the age of 15 who are persistent offenders. That is an interesting point. How do the armed forces deal with persistent offenders? Will they be subject to clause 54 and will a senior officer become involved in those cases?

My last point relates to the most serious offences, such as murder. In a civilian context, a judge would have a say, but we have a funny arrangement whereby the Secretary of State also has a say on terms of imprisonment and how those people are dealt with. That seems to apply to youths who commit offences of that sort, even though they are in the armed forces. I seek clarification on that.

Mr. Kevan Jones: On a point of order, Sir Michael. I have listened very carefully to my hon. Friend. May I ask for your guidance on the relevance of what he is saying to the clause?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Michael Lord): The hon. Gentleman echoes my own thoughts. The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) is wandering generally around the clauses. Will he tell us not just which clause he is addressing, but which precise element of that clause?

Harry Cohen: I am talking about

"Charges which may be heard summarily only with permission or by senior officer".

Some of those will relate to children—those under the age of 18. I would have thought that that was pretty plain.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Which clause is the hon. Gentleman speaking to?

Harry Cohen: I am speaking to clause 54, as I said at the outset, but I have said my piece. The matter was not raised at all in the Select Committee, but it is an important matter. I am not opposing how the Government or the armed forces deal with children, but I do think that the matter is worth commenting on.

Mr. Watson: Let me describe what the clause does before I try to answer my hon. Friend's many specific points. The clause provides that eight further criminal conduct offences can be dealt with at a summary hearing, but only if the commanding officer has permission from a higher authority or is an officer of at least two-star rank. The eight offences are listed in part 2 of schedule 1 and include, for example, assault occasioning actual bodily harm and possession in a public place of an offensive weapon. Those offences cannot be dealt with summarily at present by Army and RAF commanding officers. The requirement to obtain higher authority permission before those charges can be heard summarily means that an officer senior to the commanding officer in the chain of command will always be involved in the decision to hear those more serious charges summarily.

To answer some of the points that my hon. Friend raised, jurisdiction over civilian children will not be affected by the clause, although those children who have their parents' permission to sign up at 16 and beyond will be. We obviously try our utmost not to put in the front line those who are under 18. I will have to write to him about the point that he made about orphans. I suspect that their legal guardians could give permission, but I do not want to speculate about that. If I have missed out any of his points, I will read them in Hansard and respond as best I can.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) content?

Harry Cohen: Yes, I am.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 54 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 55 to 113 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Clauses 114 and 115 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 116

REFERRAL OF CASE FOLLOWING INVESTIGATION BY SERVICE OR CIVILIAN POLICE

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Brazier: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the clause because it raises issues that go to the heart of the one really major defect in the Bill. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who fought his corner in the most doughty way—I should say not his corner, but the corner of the many people in the middle ranks of the armed forces who believe that a profound mistake is being made in the clause. He worked so hard in the Select Committee that that rare event, a tied vote, occurred. The amendment was not made only because of the Chairman's casting vote. That prevents us from tabling that amendment to the clause in this Committee of the whole House. However, we have an opportunity to discuss the issues in a clause stand part debate. I hope that if we do not manage to reverse things here, they will be sorted out in another place.

It is a sombre time for the armed forces. Week after week we hear the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's questions expressing sorrow at the deaths of more service personnel. I hope that it is in order for me to mention the death of Sarah-Jayne Mulvihill, who was educated in Canterbury and whose parents live just outside Canterbury. She was serving in the Air Force when she was killed, but she started her military service in the Territorial Army in the 3rd Battalion the Princess of Wales's Royal Regiment in Canterbury. Those in our armed forces and their parents, wives, husbands and children look to the Committee to support them.

At this late stage, following the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot, I seek to persuade the Committee to understand why the clause is so badly flawed. I want to look at it from two angles. First, I want to try to show in general terms the damage that it does to the way in which the chain of command operates, and secondly, I want to consider it specifically in the context of events in Iraq and, potentially, other theatres.

On the chain of command, Lord Boyce commented:

"we interfere with the unique linkage between the commanding officer and his men at our peril." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1235.]

In the Select Committee, the Government made much of the support of the current chiefs of staff for the proposal, but any current or former chiefs of staff would say that they can only be as good as the chain of command beneath them. It is an old adage that a chain is as strong as the weakest link. All aspects—all levels—of the chain of command have to operate and have to feel confident in the system for it to work properly.

We should all be concerned at the news in the Sunday papers over the weekend that a group of officers appears to be in the process of setting up a staff association to represent independently the views of the middle ranks. I do not applaud that and I certainly do not blame the chiefs of staff for that, but the Government should ask themselves whether the habit that has grown up during the life of this Government of constantly publicising the views and role of the chiefs of staff in a way that would never have happened a generation ago is healthy for the armed forces. In the old days, advice to Ministers was treated as confidential.

The Government's explanatory notes on the clause state:

"Its purpose is to ensure that serious cases are seen by the DSP but that all other cases are passed to the CO".

They go on to say:

"Subsection (2) requires that a service policeman who considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge the person with a Schedule 2 offence (i.e. the most serious offences) must refer the case directly to the DSP."

Therein lies the rub. In plain English, the clause boots the commanding officer right out of the picture; it is not just that a commanding officer's power to dismiss charges is being removed. In Select Committee, the Government refused a moderate amendment that would simply have allowed the commanding officer to be consulted, which was supported by the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats and one Labour Member.

7 pm

There is enormous sympathy on both sides of the House for the work that our armed forces do. Imagine for a moment the position of a member of the armed forces. In a different context, I used to talk about a man who was frightened, tired and cold, but it would be more appropriate to talk about men and women in Iraq being frightened, tired and hot, which is not always the best framework in which to make decisions. The one safeguard that such people had in the past was the knowledge that before they could be charged with a serious offence, someone who really understood what they were going through—a commanding officer—would first have the chance to examine the situation and, if necessary, dismiss the charge. The clause not only removes that safeguard, but goes further by preventing service policemen from even consulting the commanding officer before sending charges forward.

A great deal was made in Select Committee about the Trooper Williams case. The Committee will recall that Trooper Williams stopped an enemy terrorist who was found to be carrying a large quantity of ammunition at a road block. When the man ran off, Trooper Williams, at some risk to his own life, pursued him and, eventually, shot him to stop him getting away. The commanding officer dismissed the charges against Trooper Williams. When the Attorney-General referred to that fact, he said:

"The matter could not, because of the actions of the commanding officer, be dealt with by way of court martial. It was referred to me to consider further action."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 April 2005; Vol. 671, c. WS 92.]

The then Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), commented:

"Discipline is essential and we depend on service law to enforce it".

Astonishingly, on the basis on that one case, which was subsequently thrown out by a court martial, the ancient protection for our armed forces is to be thrown out lock, stock and barrel.

It is extraordinary that there is such a vigorous programme of trying to bring prosecutions against members of our armed forces on the basis of a very small number of cases of abuse. That is happening to such an extent that the Judge Advocate-General made much-publicised comments last autumn when the case against soldiers from 3 Para was thrown out at the beginning of the court martial.

The second strand of my argument relates to the specific circumstances of Iraq. Sadly, in time, al-Qaeda and others that provide plenty of networking will no doubt read across those circumstances to Afghanistan.

With clause 116, the Government are essentially opening up a fresh route by which organised terrorist enemies may attack our armed forces, although they bomb and shoot our armed forces at the moment and try to set fire to their vehicles. The clause effectively guarantees that if false allegations are brought against members of our armed forces, they are bound to be considered seriously all the way up the system. Let me quote Lord Boyce again:

"The Armed Forces are under legal siege ... They are being pushed by people schooled not in operations but only in political correctness."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1236.]

Those are damning words indeed from an outstanding head of his profession.

Mr. Kevan Jones: As the hon. Gentleman says, Lord Boyce has spoken in another place about the legal entrapment of our armed forces. He has also written articles about the matter. When he gave evidence to the Select Committee, I asked him whether he could come up with examples of that. He said:

"I do not have any which I can give to the Committee, Chairman."

Does the hon. Gentleman know of any factual cases, because Lord Boyce clearly does not?

Mr. Brazier: I will give the Committee an example now. I have the greatest respect for the hon. Gentleman who, as a member of the Defence Committee, takes a close interest in the armed forces. I would like to be able to cite the full circumstances of the case, but I am not in a position to do so. Although several hon. Members might choose not to do so, the Committee will have to take my word that I am talking about a real case. A serving officer has given me the background facts about it, but I will have to describe it in fairly general terms because the individual victim does not want to be identified.

The case involved a soldier who had allegations brought against him in Iraq of a serious sexual assault on a female. His immediate officer and, subsequently, commanding officer examined the allegations. The allegations were supported by witness statements that were so grossly contradictory that it was absolutely inconceivable that the Crown Prosecution Service in this country would have taken them seriously. We should remember that only a tiny proportion of even rape allegations—the allegations were of not a rape, but a nasty sexual attack—come to court in this country. The commanding officer took the view that the allegations were clearly malicious and that it was impossible to reconcile the contradictory stories.

We should remember that the case took place against the background of Field Marshall Lord Inge's comments that British lawyers in Iraq are actively hawking for business and reminding Iraqis that they can get money if they can bring such cases. The commanding officer was told that if he dismissed the case, another route would be found, as happened in the Trooper Williams case, and that that would merely create much more serious difficulties further down the line. The case took more than a year to come to court martial. In the process, the soldier's life fell apart, as did his marriage. We should be very worried that Field Marshall Inge, a former Chief of the Defence Staff, is saying that British lawyers in Iraq are actively hawking the fact that there is money available for Iraqi citizens who can bring successful cases against British soldiers.

Our armed forces are under colossal pressure. We hear from week to week and month to month about members of the armed forces being killed and desperately seriously wounded. We hear of people having mental breakdowns and mental health problems, too. Those people are under colossal strain as they face a ruthless and largely invisible terrorist enemy. Effectively, we are providing a Trojan horse for an organised and extremely well-briefed enemy by removing the legal safeguard.

In Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot tried not to keep the full safeguard, but simply to put a much more modest one in its place. He won support for his amendment from Liberal Democrats and one Labour Member. There was a dead heat when there was a Division in the Committee on the matter. We cannot reopen the debate by means of an amendment today, but I hope that hon. Members will vote against the clause so that the other place may revisit the matter.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I support clause 116, the matter having been rehashed for many hours in Committee. I usually listen to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and I have a lot respect for him, but he has fallen into the trap that, unfortunately, a lot of people have on this clause. The myths that are being perpetrated by former members of the general staff are not doing them any credit.

The hon. Gentleman referred to Lord Boyce. I would like to take a little time to remind the Committee of exactly what he said in the Select Committee. It may be easy to say in the comfort of the Chamber or in a newspaper that our armed forces are in a legal entanglement and cannot operate anywhere because lawyers are looking over their shoulders, but I deal with facts and I have tried to find examples of cases that have been so disproportionate in their effect that it would endanger the way we operate. I have not found one yet. I will refer to the case that the hon. Gentleman mentioned in a minute.

I pressed Lord Boyce on the issue. I asked him:

"When you were operational were you aware of any situations which hindered the chain of command? Do you know of any examples?"

He replied:

"I commanded from the age of 28, from lieutenant through every rank up to admiral, but fortunately most of my time in command was before the culture we have today started to become as pervasive and intrusive as it has done. I personally do not ever recall being troubled by that sort of compliance."

People who know me know that I would not leave it there. I said to him:

"You have said again 'this culture that is there'... It is easy to say".

I then asked him whether he could find any concrete examples. He replied:

[Mr. Kevan Jones]

"I do not have any which I can give to the Committee, Chairman. I have to say what I have is hearsay but I am aware there are lawyers out there who are looking for business and I believe encourage the sort of litigious cases that we see."

I am sorry, but I find it very irresponsible for a former chief of staff to put forward innuendo. He could not come up with any concrete examples of our armed forces being constrained by legal restraint.

I have heard that there are lawyers ambulance-chasing for cases in Iraq. I will condemn them out of hand if there are such individuals, but please come forward with examples. Lord Boyce did not do himself any favours in not being able to come up with hard facts. He relied on innuendo and, by his own admission, on hearsay.

Mr. Don Touhig (Islwyn) (Lab/Co-op): I remember the questioning that my hon. Friend pursued in Committee. Does he remember when he pressed Admiral Lord Boyce about suggestions that our forces were now risk-averse? I commend to the Committee Lord Boyce's response:

"I am sure that we all could play a better role in trying to dampen down this particular worry, and people like myself who are sometimes standing up and speaking in the House of Lords debates and so forth perhaps need to re-look at how we are saying things in order not to fuel anxieties of that nature."

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I totally agree with what he has said. Lord Boyce and others need either to shut up or to come up with actual facts. They are in danger of perpetuating myths not just in newspapers but to front-line servicemen, who think that there is some constraint there when there is not. I have first-hand experience of talking to soldiers in Iraq, where that mythology is seeping through. If that is what Lord Boyce and others are doing, they are doing modern-day servicemen a great disservice.

The hon. Member for Canterbury said that the commanding officer's right to dismiss a charge was an ancient protection and a legal safeguard. I am sorry, but I do not see it as either. I think that the clause will strengthen the role of the commanding officer.

Commanding officers can already, if they wish, bring in the police to investigate and take advice on cases. I spoke to service police during the Select Committee's visit to Cyprus. They rightly made the point that early investigation and collection of the facts lead to less delay in ensuring that frivolous and vexatious cases do not go any further—although I accept that in Iraq people are dealing with situations that are very different from incidents in a barracks here, in Germany or in Cyprus. However, I think that the clause will strengthen the role of the commanding officer in being able to draw upon the expertise of service police to ensure that the facts are kept together very early on. One of the reasons why we will never get to the bottom of what actually happened at Deepcut and those four deaths is that vital evidence was not preserved at an early stage to allow the real truth to come out.

7.15 pm

Mr. Brazier: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has read the explanatory notes. As the clause is quite complicated, let me give him the wording from the Government's own explanatory notes:

"A service policeman who considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge the person with a Schedule 2 offence (i.e. the most serious offences) must refer the case directly to the DSP."

He is not allowed to go to the CO first. The word "directly" could not be clearer in that context. It cuts the CO right out of the loop. The case to which I referred was very much a vexatious case. The court martial dismissed it very quickly, but during the delay that took place, which would not have happened if the CO had had their way, the man's marriage fell apart and his life fell apart.

Mr. Jones: There is no excuse for delay either in a military court martial or in a civil court of law, but I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. In such cases, if the service policeman gets the evidence together and investigates the case—the one cited by the hon. Gentleman sounds very serious—and it is not thought that there is a case to prosecute, it will not get to the court martial. It may be easy to dismiss this measure flippantly, but I think that it protects the commanding officer. In the Trooper Williams case, would we have got to where we were if the evidence had been brought together at an earlier stage? I do not think so. I agree that early collection of the facts and evidence is vital in these cases to stop delay. Delay does not add to justice and it leads in some cases to the terrible outcomes to which the hon. Gentleman referred. If we do not have this measure and have a situation where a commanding officer can dismiss the case, that will leave the commanding officer open later to all types of accusations that he is covering up for his subordinates and others. I am not suggesting that that happens in any case, but they could be open to that accusation. If they have the police's evidence and involvement, it gives that protection at that stage.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I know that the hon. Gentleman would wish to take an evidence-based approach. Where is the evidence that the present law is broken and should be fixed? The position was amended by Army regulations on 29 July 2004. The amendment states:

"Where a commanding officer considers that he may wish to exercise his statutory power to dismiss a charge under this provision he should first consult with his higher authority who in turn should normally seek"

other views. Where is the evidence that those regulations are broken and should be fixed? He refers to Trooper Williams, but can he refer, to cases that show that we should break with the current regulations, which seem to serve the Army well and help to retain the integrity of the commanding officer? I asked the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) the same question in the Select Committee, and am still waiting for an answer.

Mr. Jones: The Bill is about updating our laws. The year 2006 is very different from 1955. Today, we are far more litigious. There are far more questions about the way things happen. The clause will ensure that a commanding officer can have confidence that once an investigation takes place, the facts will be brought together and they will be dealt with. If we do not have that, we will have more cases like that of Trooper Williams.

There is a naivety in the press in looking at some of the Iraq cases. Having spoken to investigating officers on our visit to Iraq, I accept that it is difficult to gather evidence and information in some situations. Even in those cases, however, it protects the commanding officer and the accused if evidence is gathered early and if things are not dismissed out of hand, otherwise there could be accusations of a cover-up. Clearly, there was no such cover-up in the case that has been raised.

Patrick Mercer: I am interested in the views of the hon. Gentleman, whose sound Nottinghamshire logic shines through. It is a few years since I was a member of the armed forces, but even in my day the commanding officer would have been extremely foolish if, after a schedule 2 offence, he did not immediately refer to his senior and then call in the Royal Military Police special investigations branch. I do not know of any instance, either in barracks or on operations, in which a commanding officer did not do so.

Mr. Jones: I defer to the hon. Gentleman's experience, but that is best practice. There may be cases in which the commanding officer does not refer to his senior, so the provision provides important protection for him. Throughout our evidence-taking sessions and on our visits to establishments both in the UK and abroad, the chiefs of staff and commanding officers did not suggest that there was a serious problem. Former chiefs of staff and the Conservative party have difficulties with the proposal and there have been efforts to perpetuate the myth that the Bill interferes with the legal process and the command structure of the British armed forces. Clearly, it does not do so. As the hon. Gentleman said, I usually deal with facts, and it is important that we do not allow irresponsible comments by people who should know better to damage the Bill.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I concur that on our visits it was plain that this was not something about which commanding officers felt strongly. However, I was told about an incident—I think it was the Trooper Williams case—in which the commanding officer acted exactly as the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) proposed. He consulted lawyers and then decided that there was not a case to answer. That action was taken very quickly, and subsequent advice was that the original advice to the commanding officer was incorrect. By then, however, it was too late and there was no other way for the matter to be investigated, which led to the unfortunate result that Trooper Williams was prosecuted in the civilian courts, which no one wanted. That is why the protection has been included in the Bill.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The measure allows the commanding officer, in certain cases, to submit evidence and information in mitigation. There is not a problem, and we did not take any evidence from service chiefs or commanding officers, either here or abroad, to suggest that it was. Former service chiefs could not provide any examples.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman said that the commanding officer would be able to submit evidence. I accept that he could submit evidence to the court martial, but the clause rules out a compromise whereby he could submit evidence before the matter proceeds to court. The word "directly" makes it clear that evidence must be submitted before the commanding officer has had an opportunity to have his say.

Mr. Jones: I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman is not correct. As I understand it, the commanding officer could submit mitigating information to the prosecuting authorities before a decision was made to proceed with a case. That would prevent circumstances that were highlighted earlier from arising.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Where does the Bill state that?

Mr. Jones: I think that it was in the evidence that we took, and it was one of the recommendations in the final Select Committee report, to which the hon. Gentleman agreed.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman has made an assertion that the commanding officer may make representations. Can he tell the Committee where the Bill states that? The Bill makes it perfectly clear that there is a duty on the service policeman to report to the director of service prosecutions. It is no good the hon. Gentleman looking at the report—he should look at the Bill and tell the Committee where it makes provision for the commanding officer to make those representations.

Mr. Jones: I shall read paragraph 50 of the report to which the hon. Gentleman agreed:

> "Lord Boyce advocated a requirement that the Commanding Officer write to the prosecuting authority describing the context of the incident. We debated whether it was necessary to include such an express duty or a permissive provision in the Bill. In the Standing Committee phase of our deliberations, the Minister argued that Commanding Officers were already entitled to make the relevant authorities aware of any mitigating factors, including the military context, and that a statutory provision would introduce delay into the process."

The Committee made the following recommendation:

> "We emphasise the importance of Commanding Officers exercising their responsibilities to inform the prosecuting authorities of any relevant mitigating factors and the context in which events occurred."

Mr. Touhig: In a debate in the Select Committee, I told the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth):

> "Written guidance will set out the standard operating procedures under which the service police will be obliged to act".—[Official Report, Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, 28 March 2006; c. 78.]

I sought to give the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that assurance, and we did not feel that it was necessary to include it in the Bill. Guidance will be issued and it will set out the role of commanding officers and service police so that everyone is properly informed.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful for that intervention, which clarifies the position. The commanding officer will not be left out of the loop, as has been suggested by the Opposition spokesmen.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman has been generous in giving way, but that simply is not good enough. We have stripped commanding officers of a statutory power and all that has been substituted is a promise of guidance, which is not debated by Parliament and can disappear tomorrow.

Mr. Jones: I do not think that safeguards have been stripped away because, as I have said, we are bolstering and safeguarding the commanding officer's role. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) asserted that the commanding officer would be taken out of the loop completely, but I have tried to emphasise the fact that he will have input, not at court martial, but at an earlier stage when the prosecution is taken forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) reminded us of his promise of guidance and, in the spirit of the Bill, the Conservatives were happy that that guidance would be produced.

I do not think for one minute that the commanding officer will be carved out of the process altogether. His role in the submission of evidence is reinforced, ensuring that we do not end up in a situation where evidence comes forward too late and cases go to court that should not do so.

Patrick Mercer: I forgot my manners earlier in failing both to welcome the Under-Secretary and to congratulate him on the excellent start that he has made.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) made a powerful speech. He put me firmly in my place by making the point that just because someone has not served in the armed forces, that does not mean that they cannot understand them. I could not agree more—the last thing that I want to do is to try to set myself up as someone who can lecture. All that I can do is bring my rather dated knowledge to bear on our proceedings. I salute the contribution of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), who has spent a great deal of time on armed forces matters without any previous service experience, although I disagree with him. Briefly, clause 116 attacks important relationships at unit level across the three forces. I hope that the Committee will forgive me if I limit my remarks to the Army, because that is where my experience lies. The rank of lieutenant-colonel and its equivalent in the other forces is crucial, as commanding officers have powers at their disposal that are the acme, limit or horizon for the private soldiers, seamen and airmen who serve under them. To attack that relationship is to diminish those powers and take something terribly important away from the way our armed forces are asked to do their business.

7.30 pm

It is worth pausing for a moment to think about the circumstances that surround our armed forces in Iraq. It would seem that it is unique, a new theatre of operations; that counter-insurgency, counter-terrorism, peacekeeping—call it what you will—are something new to our forces; and that this is not conventional war. However, precisely these conditions pertained in the 1960s and early 1970s before the armed forces got heavily involved in Northern Ireland. They were the anvil on which the Army Act 1955 was founded and subsequently amended to work at unit level.

We have heard about the commanding officers welcoming the proposed changes to the Army Act or to military law generally. That is as may be. I was never faced with very serious crimes committed on active service, but I had some extremely difficult crimes to deal with inside barracks, and I would have loved to be able to say, "Nothing to do with me, youth. You've got to go now into the military justice system and I don't have to make a decision about you, Private So-and-so." That would have been great; I would have loved it. It would have been a cop-out for me as the commanding officer. But that attacks precisely the relationship between the private soldier and the commanding officer of his unit.

Let us bear in mind what we are talking about. The bulk of kids fighting in Iraq today—they are kids—are aged about 18 and a half or 19. They come, for the most part, from very difficult circumstances. I was interested to hear earlier how the House regards these fine upstanding individuals and their ability to make decisions. They are fine upstanding individuals, but by golly, they come from difficult backgrounds, for the most part. It was my experience that they needed every bit of leadership, guidance and protection that their officers and non-commissioned officers could provide for them.

That is why the regimental sergeant-major, standing outside what we called commanding officer's orders—in other words, a commanding officer acting as a magistrate inside barracks or on operations—would say to a private soldier, "Are you guilty?", to which the private soldier would generally say, "Of course I'm guilty. I daren't say I'm not." Clearly, that is nonsense. It was up to the commanding officer to say, as a soldier came in front of him to get summary justice, "Look, son, you are now in front of a court of law. Just because you've gone through your platoon commander, your company commander and now your commanding officer, that does not mean to say that you are necessarily guilty."

The private soldier depends on the commanding officer to be his advocate, his leader, his protector. The private soldier who is sleeping for four hours a day in two two-hour bursts, who one minute is being shot at by well-armed terrorists and the next is expected to dish out food aid or whatever to injured and hungry civilians, requires a lieutenant-colonel or his equivalent also to have had four hours sleep that day, also to be operating in conditions of 100° Fahrenheit, and also to be required to carry a 60 or 70 lb set of webbing.

Mr. Simon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for sharing with the House his experience, which is genuinely insightful. I ask this in a spirit of inquiry, rather than as any kind of rhetorical point-scoring. He spoke about a cop-out. Can he explain why the commanding officer must dispense justice, rather than just guarantee it?

Patrick Mercer: That is an extremely good intervention and a fair one. The commanding officer does not always need to dish out justice to the soldier, but he needs to examine rigorously every case before him involving any soldier, sailor or airman under his command. If he does not do so, he is failing the often simple souls who require that officer to give them that protection.

That is what worries me so much about the idea of a service policeman being brought into the equation at such an early stage. I reiterate the point that I made to the hon. Member for North Durham. It would be a foolish commanding officer who, in the event of almost anything other than a routine offence, did not quickly get legal advice and call in the Royal Military Police special investigations branch for their guidance.

Mr. Hancock: Hon. Members are right to recognise the hon. Gentleman's experience and the usefulness of it. Is he suggesting to the Committee that for the type of crimes outlined in schedule 2, a commanding officer would be able to make a judgment, after a police officer—a service officer or a civilian—had had time to investigate the crime? How would the commanding officer have the time and the means to carry out the sort of investigation that would be needed for some of those crimes?

Patrick Mercer: Again, that is an excellent intervention. The Trooper Williams case underlines it.

I take the point that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) made earlier. As far as Trooper Williams was concerned, the commanding officer was his god. He was his figurehead of leadership, justice and everything that happened inside the 2nd Royal Tank Regiment. If we attack that relationship, two things happen. First, the private soldier, lance-corporal and so on, feels that there is no longer an umbrella of protection given to him by a man whom he knows personally, who, within the constraints of rank, is a personal friend, and who has probably served with his father, his uncle or other people from the same area—Portsmouth, Newark or wherever.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am still trying to follow the hon. Gentleman's logic. If, in his experience, to which I defer, and in the experience of his colleagues, in a serious case, the commanding officer would refer to the law and bring in the SIB, what is the problem with what is being proposed?

Patrick Mercer: The problem is simple. The commanding officer must have the power to say, "No. There is no case to answer. I have listened to what the legal authorities have to say, and in my judgment, as commanding officer, this soldier should not be prosecuted. This should go no further." On the other hand, he may be in a position to say, "Absolutely. This is beyond my powers to deal with." Ultimately, he must have that sanction; otherwise the measure cuts away at the fundamental relationship between officer and soldier.

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman has just proved my point. Is he suggesting that in a very serious case, the judge and jury, even after a police investigation, should be the commanding officer? I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was still a member of the Defence Committee when we considered the Deepcut deaths—but is not the problem that fact that excluding independent oversight at an early stage led to problems later? If the angel commanding officers whom he describes bring in investigators and legal authorities as a matter of course, what is the problem?

Patrick Mercer: Of course commanding officers are no angels. Of course their judgment is faulty. The problem will not arise in peacetime circumstances in barracks such as Deepcut, Tidworth and so on. In those circumstances, I agree that there is time for the Royal Military Police and others to be used to the proper extent. On operations there, is no time. On operations, one is driving hard against an enemy. We are not talking about the overthrow of the Third Reich. We are talking about peacekeeping operations, where one minute, one is face to face with the enemy, at bayonet length from the enemy, and the next minute one is trying to dress his wounds and give out food to his wife. It is in those circumstances that the commanding officer must have that sanction, where he can use his judgment. If he does not, the fundamentals are attacked.

On my second point, I ask for the Minister's earnest consideration. The Army works on the principle of mission command. A commander takes an idea, decides what he wants to do, apportions missions to his subordinates and gives them the necessary resources. Unless the subordinate says that he does not have the necessary resources, the mission is entirely up to the subordinate commander. Part of that, particularly in these circumstances, means that the subordinate commander, in this case a lieutenant-colonel, must have the legal powers to deal with his soldiers in the difficult circumstances posed by places such as Iraq. If the commanding officer cannot deal quickly, effectively and legally with the soldiers under his command, to all intents and purposes a very important strand of tactical doctrine—mission command—is taken away from him.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I want to pick up on the hon. Gentleman's point that Trooper Williams looked to his commanding officer as his god, but the fact remains that he was let down, because he was then put into the civilian system. That is the point that this measure seeks to address. For precisely the reason that the hon. Gentleman gave about civilian judges and juries having no idea what it is like in the heat of battle, that is the last thing that we want our armed forces to have to do, as every soldier, sailor and airman to whom I spoke said. We are not talking about getting leave from barracks; we are talking about very serious offences here. The hon. Gentleman referred to snap decisions, but it is not healthy that snap decisions should be made in such serious cases, which could end up in the civilian courts.

Patrick Mercer: I agree. This sounds like a snap decision, but it is not. It will not be the sort of decision that the commanding officer takes off the cuff. We are not saying that from his tank turret he says, "Yes, Trooper Williams, not guilty. Get out of it." It does not happen like that and it will never happen like that. I do just wonder though why current practices, particularly on operations, have not been enshrined in the Bill. I believe that Opposition amendments were tabled that would have enshrined what happens at the moment—that the commanding officer, as often as possible, would refer to legal authority. Why cannot such practices be introduced to the Bill, so that the important relationship between private soldier and commanding officer is not attacked?

Mr. Simon: Again in a spirit of genuine inquiry, can the hon. Gentleman give a concrete example of a case where this will go wrong? Can he give us an example of what that will look like? So far, it seems nebulous and hard to get hold of.

Patrick Mercer: I cannot, but I will hypothesise. Serving at a generally lower tempo of operations than what is going on inside Iraq, one of the warrant officers, second class, under my command—not, I hasten to add, from my cap badge, but from the Royal Military Police—attempted to murder his interpreter in the Serb republic. As his commanding officer, the case was referred to me. I immediately understood that it was a schedule 2 case, which had to be dealt with. I could not possibly say, in the circumstances, whether I should or should not have dealt with it. I immediately passed that on to the relevant legal authority. Had we been involved in a pursuit of the enemy at that stage, had we been involved in circumstances such as those in Iraq, I would have wanted the power to hand, so that I could reassure the private soldiers and lance-corporals under my command that they would always be protected by someone whom they knew who understood the circumstances.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that if, in the heat of battle, someone under his command shot his interpreter, somehow it would be right for him to have the authority to dismiss that case out of hand without any investigation? I am sorry, I just do not agree with that.

Patrick Mercer: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has not quite understood me. What I am saying is that in a high tempo operation, where things go wrong—and they will—the commanding officer must be able to carry out an investigation, take the advice that is to hand and deal with the matter as it faces him. If he does not, it will be very difficult for the private soldier under his command to continue to trust him.

Mr. Touhig: The hon. Gentleman has made an important contribution to the debate throughout the day from his experiences, but drawing on his experience, if at the height of an engagement there was an incident, perhaps such as the one he describes, would he not then ensure the success of the operation, the protection of his soldiers, and so on, and then get the matter investigated at a more peaceful time when it could be thoroughly considered, rather than take a decision in the way that he seems to be implying he would take one now?

Patrick Mercer: It is a hard question to answer, but I am doing my best to answer it as honestly as I can. I have never been in circumstances where there is a pressing series of operations, one after another, against a determined enemy, with pauses out of the line where one needs to deal with this sort of discipline. But my father and my grandfather did. They faced such operations. Neither was a commanding officer, but they were infantry majors, and they felt the need to be able to use summary powers to deal with similar serious offences. That was a long time ago. I can imagine circumstances where the commanding officer at a high tempo of operations will need those powers. If I may put the point to bed, those powers are important, they will rarely be used, but when they are used, as in the case of the commanding officer of 2RTR, they should not be challenged.

My final point is that the relationship between a regimental commander, of whatever cap badge, and the police, is always difficult. It is difficult for people who have not served to understand the feeling of the regimental family. The regimental family is the building brick upon which the army is built. No matter what assaults are being made on that system at the moment, the fact remains that the battalion, 600 to 900 men, know and understand each other. Up until the new reforms that have been introduced recently, battalions could guarantee that they all came from the same territorial area. To introduce the Royal Military Police, or their equivalent, into the chain of command at this stage is to cut away at the authority and trust that subordinate commanders have in their commanding officers. It will be a detrimental move if the Royal Military Police, or their equivalent, the service police, are used in preference to the commanding officer, who, as has been said, will always refer to the legal authorities. That injures the regimental relationship—the same relationship as on a warship or an airfield—and I ask the Government to think carefully about the matter and to take it no further.

Mr. Benyon: As is the way of things, my points have been eloquently made by my hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Newark (Patrick Mercer), so I shall be brief and make just one or two further points. I am very concerned about the implications of the clause and the effect that it will have on the relationship between commanding officers and those who serve them.

The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) made a good point about the idea of gangs of lawyers following our forces wherever they go as part of operations being a perception that is not borne out in reality. I shall not stand here and pretend that there is an office of Matrix Chambers opening up in Basra and that our troops will constantly be harassed under human rights legislation. Nevertheless, we have to accept that we live in a much more litigious society, and our troops going on operations are daily faced with a greater threat of litigation. We know that untoward advances have been made to people in an area such as Basra and we have to be extremely careful about how we protect our forces in that context.

Clause 116 is important in the context of alleged crimes committed by soldiers. Commanding officers understand more than anyone else the context in which an alleged offence may have occurred. I will not go through the details of the Trooper Williams case, because it was discussed at great length in Committee.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that society has become much more litigious, which is sad, but clause 116 will protect both the commanding officer and the accused. If the special investigations branch is involved from an early stage, evidence will be gathered and the facts will be established. That means that the commanding officer cannot dismiss a serious charge, which could lead to accusations of a cover-up or make it difficult to gather evidence to establish what happened.

Mr. Bosper: The hon. Gentleman has made a good point. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newark has said, however, it would be nice as a commanding officer to say, "Sorry mate. You're on your own. I have no responsibility for this case, because it has been taken out of my hands." A good commanding officer will feel that his position and his relationship with the people who serve under him is diminished by that right being taken away from him. Commanding officers will not thank this House for such protection, if it is protection, because they will feel that their position has been undermined.

Mr. Simon: Is that not a little anachronistic and unrealistic? The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) has said that, in the eyes of the private soldier, the commanding officer is God. Is that not an unrealistic burden to place on the shoulders of the commanding officer? In this day and age, is it right to say that that relationship, unless conducted between a "god" and a private soldier, is somehow illegitimate, and not valuable or productive? That cannot be the case, can it?

Mr. Bosper: That is a burden that commanding officers are determined they should keep. They understand more than anybody the circumstances in which their soldiers are likely to find themselves, and they need to be responsible for the decisions that they make under fire or in difficult conditions, because the people involved come under their command.

Patrick Mercer: Does my hon. Friend agree that to be in command is a huge privilege? It is a burden that is gladly taken and gladly borne, and it is always respected by the private soldiers who impose it.

Mr. Bosper: Absolutely. I never rose to the rank or grandeur of my hon. Friend, and my experience of the armed forces is even more dated than his. As a platoon commander in a rifle regiment on operations in Northern Ireland, I represented the views of one of my soldiers to my company commander when that soldier committed a military offence, and I stood in at the hearing at which the charge was put and a punishment was meted out. As a company second in command, I represented my company commander at hearings with the commanding officer when people under my command had committed more serious offences. Clause 116 would impose a glass ceiling, which would mean no responsibility for commanding officers if a crime is serious enough.

Mr. Simon: That is a false prospectus. The hon. Gentleman has said that there cannot be a situation in which the commanding officer is forced to say, "I'm sorry son. You're on your own." That line is actually a given part of the transaction at all times. If some dodgy squaddie who has murdered an old lady turns up in the commanding officer's office and says, "I'm sorry governor, I have just murdered an old lady," the commanding officer would not say, "Don't worry Hughes, I will look after you." The commanding officer would say, "I'm sorry son. You're on your own."

Mr. Bosper: The hon. Gentleman is being unrealistic. He cannot suggest that the SIB would be not involved in such a serious case.

Mr. Taddy: I recognise the concerns raised by Conservative Members. When the hon. Member for Aldershot raised the matter in Select Committee on 29 March, I sought to manage his concerns by discussing the relationship between the director of service prosecutions and the commanding officer:

> "We acknowledge that in such cases a commanding officer may have valuable information that could assist the director in the tests that he must apply before proceeding to charge individuals. A commanding officer will have to be made aware of such a case, because it will affect one of his people and the operating efficiency of his unit."—[Official Report, Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, 29 March 2006; c. 71.]

I went on to discuss the written guidance, which was pooh-poohed a moment ago. My point in Select Committee was that under the proposed guidance the service police would be obliged to [illegible] in a certain regard. I sought to manage the concerns of Conservative Members by pointing out that there would be a positive and important link between the role of the commanding officer and the service police in any investigation. We cannot wipe out the role of the commanding officer in that respect.

Mr. Bosper: In his former position, the hon. Gentleman tried to move towards the view advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), but it is not good enough to put the point in written guidance, because it needs to be on the face of the Bill to provide the necessary security. The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot sought to incorporate into the Bill the need for the commanding officer to be part of the process.

Mr. Bruster: My hon. Friend has been confronted with the ridiculous example of someone who murdered an old lady, but there is the much more relevant example of someone who killed a young lady: Private Clegg, who shot a woman at a roadblock and was convicted because the case was tried through the civil process as murder. That judgment was overturned only after two appeals, but if the case had been considered in a military context from the beginning, it might well never have gone to court.

Mr. Bosper: I could go into the case of Private Ian Thain, with whom I served in Northern Ireland, which has haunted me down the years. He was required to take a decision in the most difficult circumstances. The matter was taken out of the hands of military forces, which should have been able to protect him, and he was convicted of a murder that he did not commit. He went to prison as a criminal and served a sentence with some of the most hardened criminals in this country. That case has haunted me, and it will continue to haunt me so long as clauses such as this continue to come before this House. All I want to do is to incorporate the simplest protection into the Bill.

[Mr. Benyon]

Lord Boyce has been quoted more often in this debate than Lord Goldsmith has ever been quoted in the context of other legislation, and I shall quote him again:

"It is impossible to achieve and maintain the necessary level of discipline unless those under his or her command are in absolutely no doubt that their commanding officer has authority over them."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1235.]

The failure to involve someone in the prosecution of a crime who understands the context of that crime puts at risk the unique relationship in our armed forces between a commanding officer and the men who serve under him.

Mr. Hancock: I am surprised by the way in which the debate has gone, because hon. Members have not read the introduction to the clause, which states:

"Duty of service policemen following investigation".

Clause 116 is all about the actions that occur after the service police or civilian police have carried out an investigation, and the list in schedule 2 covers everything from treason to murder to child abuse to child pornography. Are hon. Members really arguing that the commanding officer should be able to carry out such investigations? I would urge those Members who have not done so to read the report by the Surrey police into the events at Deepcut—not so much on the deaths of the four young people but the many examples that they gave of genuine complaints by members of our armed forces about abuse that they suffered, including serious sexual assaults, which were never investigated by the service police or by the civilian police. The Surrey police were extraordinarily critical of the chain of command that allowed such serious allegations to go unchallenged.

8 pm

I understand that when this was discussed in Committee, colleagues supported the view that the commanding officer should be informed about investigations into schedule 2 offences. I think that he has every right to be informed, but not for him then to be able to make a judgment on whether the case should be pursued. One would imagine that if a police officer, whether service or civilian, was investigating something as serious as a crime outlined in schedule 2, they would have sufficient evidence to be able to take the case further. There is clearly an obligation placed on the investigating officer that they must have substantial evidence to take the matter further.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman and I served together for a long time on the Defence Committee, and I know of his close interest in and family connections with service matters. He mentioned areas such as child pornography which are a long way away from the serviceman's job. Does he accept that in crimes such as a shooting under very difficult and uncertain circumstances, the commanding officer has an insight into that which an investigatory team, who have perhaps come out of an air-conditioned office, will not necessarily have?

Mr. Hancock: I cannot imagine any set of circumstances in which a soldier, or any other service personnel member, was accused of discharging a weapon in such a way that somebody was killed or injured that would not involve the commanding officer, who could not be left out of the loop in the initial investigations that would have to take place. The problem in Iraq is that there are insufficient military policemen to be able to help our service personnel to perform some of their duties. People who have been there recently, including some of our colleagues in this House, will tell us that.

The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) was good enough to recognise that until 1970, the situation was governed by a different style of soldiering and chain of command. Ireland changed that because of the type of confrontation that was faced daily by our armed forces over those 30-odd years. There were always going to be very difficult circumstances when weapons were fired, people were killed and soldiers were prosecuted through the civilian courts or action was taken through the military courts. Ireland was never going to be an easy situation.

The Bill provides a much clearer definition of the way in which these matters will be resolved. I believe that clause 116 is helpful. There was a situation in my constituency that involved naval personnel and civilian personnel working for the Navy who were all, to one degree or another, charged with offences relating to child pornography. The civilian was punished quite severely, while the service personnel were dealt with through the chain of command and virtually got away with a warning, in respect of almost identical crimes. That case has gone to the desk of the Minister, because, rightly, the civilian involved felt that he had been treated differently.

I am not wedded to the idea that the chain of command is always right. It does not end with the Chief of the Defence Staff. There is a chain of command above that—the political bosses at the MOD, under whichever party, who set the parameters. The Bill is not driven by the views of the Chief of the Defence Staff, but by the need to reform armed forces legislation to bring it into the 21st century and to deal with the way in which service personnel should expect to be dealt with. The chain of command is by no means perfect, as the hon. Member for Newark was generous enough to admit. It cannot be right for us to say that we are wedded to it under any circumstances. If any individual in our armed forces has a serious allegation under schedule 2 being pursued against them, there is a duty and a responsibility for that to go further, and for it not to remain in-house and within the command structure. Anything short of that would enhance the public's perception of the armed forces being treated differently, and that cannot and should not be the case. This is about is having a level playing field so that everyone clearly understands that if they are investigated for a schedule 2 offence, it will not stay in-house but will go straight to the civilian authorities or to the Crown Prosecution Service.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not just about a level playing field but about, first, giving the accused protection in terms of knowing that the alleged crime is being investigated properly and that the evidence has been gathered; and secondly, that if the prosecution goes ahead it is based on the evidence that has been collected near to where the crime was committed, whereas if the case had been dismissed and reinvestigated later on, things might have been lost?

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman is right. I am sure that his remarks are borne out by the hours of evidence that he took in the Armed Forces Bill Committee and in the Defence Committee. We have had that explained to us time and again. The Minister of State, who is in his place, has a lot of credit coming his way for genuinely believing—I am sure that his new boss and the former Secretary of State share the same view—that the duty of care is to our serving personnel and to their families, as well as to the victims of crimes that are perpetrated by members of the armed forces. It is not an exclusive club whereby the military only look after their own—their duty of care goes way beyond that. That is what this clause of this much-needed Bill gets to the heart of, and the Committee should not be prevailed upon to go along with voting against its standing part.

Patrick Mercer: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is not an exclusive club. It has to be an organisation that is entirely visible to the outside. However, this band of brothers is called upon to do extraordinary things, and I suggest that in those extraordinary circumstances it needs extraordinary powers.

Mr. Hancock: I do not disagree. Of course, this band of brothers, for want of a better phrase, does need support, but it also needs the integrity of the law that says that it will be treated it on an equal basis with the victims of any allegation that might be made against it. The public perception is that in so many of these cases the military are able to be their own judge and jury.

The Surrey police report was a lesson that we can allow things to go unchallenged only for so long. It was a rather cosy coincidence that it was put forward so strongly that that all the issues were dealt with properly under the chain of command. It was obvious to the Surrey police that many of the men and women who gave evidence to them felt that they had been manifestly let down by the "god" of the commanding officer or the ability of the commanding officer to see through a fictitious allegation. Sadly, many of our armed forces men and women felt badly let down in that situation. The Bill will give them greater hope that there will be equality under the law and in the law as regards our armed forces.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: We have had an interesting and good debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) brought passion and personal experience to it, which, along with the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), illuminated our discussions. They both showed that the perspective from which we must view the Bill is not that of what happens in a brawl on a Saturday night in Aldershot or Colchester, but what happens on the front line on operations.

Our armed forces have never been so involved in operations as in recent years. We have all seen—because television is there today—the circumstances in which they fight. We therefore have a duty to examine the provision from the point of view of its impact on our armed forces on the front line. It is inevitable that we are more concerned with the Army than the other two services because of the way in which the Army fights. The Royal Air Force pilot who fires a missile will not see the enemy. Those on a naval vessel who use bombardment may not see the enemy, but the soldier does. Indeed, the soldier is often required to engage in hand-to-hand combat.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), not only for his kind support to me but for the way in which he opened the debate a couple of hours ago. I am most grateful to him. He is right that the clause and the associated provisions—we are holding only one stand part debate, but several related clauses go to the heart of the measure—represent the most significant change that the Bill makes to existing practice. The chain of command is at the heart of that key debate.

The expertise of senior officers on the ground who have first-hand understanding of the conditions that their troops face has long been essential in deciding whether split-second decisions made by soldiers in danger should lead to prosecution. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury graphically illustrated that from his experience. Until now, we trusted those in a position of command to decide whether those under their command should face prosecution for their actions while carrying out their duty in good faith. As I have said previously, the Bill removes that trust.

Under current arrangements, commanding officers examine an incident and are informed by their knowledge of the military context—the operational circumstances—in deciding whether there is a case to answer. Under the Bill, if an incident occurs or an accusation of a serious offence is made, the case will be passed by a service policeman directly to the service prosecuting authority for a perhaps lengthy investigation.

In the Select Committee, I asked the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) whether he could guarantee that the arrangements would not lead to more investigations that resulted in legal proceedings. He could not give me the cast-iron guarantee that I sought. Let me therefore pose the question again and perhaps the Under-Secretary can assist. Will the service prosecuting authority resemble its civilian counterpart in that it will base its decisions to prosecute on the likelihood of securing a conviction rather than on a proper understanding of the circumstances that led to the alleged event?

Lord Boyce has been much quoted this evening. I shall quote him accurately, for the benefit of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). When he gave evidence to the Select Committee, he said that there was a "feeling of legal encirclement" among members of our armed forces. He said that the removal of the power of a commanding officer based on the facts and the situation on the ground to dismiss a charge against a serviceman risks adding to that feeling. Let me put Lord Boyce's remarks in context. He also said:

> "There is a feeling of risk averseness out there now. There is a feeling of legal encirclement... It is certainly the culture of litigation and the blame culture that pervades our life today. The answer to your question is yes, I am concerned about risk aversion. There is absolutely no question in my mind that this is out there."

Mr. Kevan Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I shall not at this stage because the hon. Gentleman has quoted Lord Boyce enough and it is fair to put the noble Lord on the record.

Lord Boyce also warned that tampering with military command could damage operational effectiveness. He said of a commanding officer:

"If you diminish his authority or start to erode his authority, you will have a fracture which is ultimately going to cause failure."

That is the issue before us tonight. We must ensure that we do nothing that fractures that authority.

After visiting those on deployment, the Select Committee concluded that there had not been much opposition in the Army to the Bill's proposed changes. Although I accept that, we must realise that the proposals in the Bill have hardly sunk in at all in the military. I do not especially blame the Government. The guys are out there trying to fight a war and they have no time to start assessing the niceties of the legal position. Although the people to whom we spoke had been briefed, I suspect that some had been briefed only a little in advance of our visit. Some of the changes will take time to make an impact.

8.15 pm

As has been said, the change that the Government propose results partly from the Trooper Williams case, in which the commanding officer, on legal military advice, dismissed a charge of murder against Trooper Williams, who was said to have shot an innocent Iraqi. More senior military lawyers believed that the advice was wrong, but could not reopen the case and the Army high command felt under political pressure, in the grotesque phrase that Sir Alistair Irwin used, to "offer for prosecution" Trooper Williams. That could be done only through the civil courts.

Sir Alistair Irwin said that with the "current legal, political and pinger group interest in the deaths of Iraqi civilians during Operation Telic, there is a significant possibility that this case, our investigation and the subsequent failure to offer for prosecution could become a cause célèbre for pressure groups."

I have said it before, and I repeat that I find it reprehensible that a senior officer used the expression "offer for prosecution" about one of the men under his command. I do not believe that Pontius Pilate would have used that expression.

At the instigation of the Attorney-General, Williams was charged but the case was dismissed by the civilian judge. The Government argue that the removal of the power to dismiss a serious charge will prevent a repetition of the Williams case. However, the commanding officer's judgment was vindicated. The case says more about the high command and the political pressures that led to Trooper Williams being offered for prosecution than about the power of the commanding officer to dismiss a charge. I agree with the Government that we must avoid such a case in the future. I am at one with the hon. Member for Islwyn, the former Under-Secretary, that we must find a way to keep such matters in the military domain and not leave them up to civilian courts.

Mr. Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the system for which the Bill provides had been in place at the time of the Trooper Williams case, the police evidence would have been collected early and led to an informed judgment earlier, which perhaps would not have meant the unacceptably lengthy process that he describes? If that had been done, Trooper Williams would not have gone through what he did.

Mr. Howarth: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. The facts prove him wrong. The commanding officer's original judgment was right. He did the right thing. He took legal advice and investigated, but some lawyer in uniform higher up thought that the advice given by the legal officer on the ground was wrong. We then had the farce—well, it was not a farce for Trooper Williams; it was a serious personal tragedy for him. It was a disgrace. We then had the disgrace of the case going through the military courts so that the high command could be absolved of failing to offer a soldier for prosecution.

In the Select Committee, I suggested that there were ways round the problem. I suggested, as the hon. Member for Islwyn was kind enough to point out, that there were ways of dealing with it. The first option that I proposed would have given a commanding officer the power to dismiss charges, even when he would not have had the power to deal with them summarily, but would have incorporated the amendments to Queen's Regulations of 29 July 2004, which would require the commanding officer to seek the approval of his higher authority before dismissing any charge. That is the situation that prevails in Iraq today. As my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) suggested, that is the way the system works today, and I cannot see why we cannot replicate it in the Bill.

This is a lost opportunity. I am sorry that the Government could not accede to our proposals, and I would like to put it to them again that they would reflect current practice, which appears to be working reasonably well. They would also address the problem, which we all agree must never arise again, of a charge arising from an event on operations during active service going outside the military domain and being dealt with by a civilian court that would not understand the military context. I hope that the Government will be prepared to look again at this measure in another place, particularly once they have heard the advice of the former Chief of the Defence Staff.

In the meantime, however, I am disappointed that the Government were unable to accept the amendment that I tabled to clause 116, to which the hon. Member for Islwyn and others have already referred. My amendment would have required a service policeman investigating a charge against a member of the armed forces to inform that individual's commanding officer of any intention to refer the case to the director of service prosecutions. The amendment would also have made provision for the commanding officer to make his own representations about the case to the director of service prosecutions.

I should like to explain to the Minister that that would have enabled the commanding officer to set the episode in the military context, so that the director of service prosecutions would have that information to hand. In a moment, I shall deal with the response that the hon. Member for Islwyn gave me in Committee, but first I want to explain this point to the Minister. I know that he is new to his post and—I do not say this in a patronising sense—he has a huge amount to master. It seemed to be accepted by the Government that it was desirable that the commanding officer should have that input. We pressed the matter to a vote, and the Committee divided equally. It was only the Chairman's casting vote that enabled the Government to carry the day. However, I remain convinced that there should be a requirement that the commanding officer be informed.

The Bill already reduces the power of a commanding officer to dismiss a serious charge against an individual under his command. However, to remove the commanding officer from the loop altogether would reduce his authority over his men yet further. We have heard powerful evidence tonight from a former commanding officer of the importance of the bond between men and their commander. The Committee would be ill advised not to recognise the force of the argument put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Newark.

The provision to allow a commanding officer to submit his own report once a charge had been referred to the director of service prosecutions would ensure that the assessment of the commanding officer, setting out the military context, was included in the director's assessment of whether there was a case to answer. The commanding officer would know the men under his command. He would probably have been present when the incident took place; if not, he would not have been far away. He would therefore bring not only more immediate knowledge of the military context but, most importantly, knowledge of the individual concerned.

Will the removal of the safeguard of having the commanding officer in the decision-making process increase the chances of a serviceman being put on trial without adequate understanding of the operational circumstances? Lord Boyce said in the other place on 14 July:

"Command and discipline in the Armed Forces go absolutely hand in hand. A commanding officer, who has total responsibility for the command of his ship or unit, must, in turn, be responsible for—and carry out—its discipline. It is impossible to achieve and maintain the necessary level of discipline unless those under his or her command are in absolutely no doubt that their commanding officer has authority over them."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1235.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Newark said that we must maintain that bond, and he was right.

The hon. Member for North Durham has had great fun trying to suggest that the former First Sea Lord and Chief of the Defence Staff had somehow failed to provide adequate evidence to sustain his argument. I have referred to the risk-averseness that many people in the armed forces recognise. However, since the beginning of our proceedings, a document has come to light. It is headed "Reinforcement of pre-deployment training in Iraq", and it was produced at the beginning of December by Major Whitelegge, who is SO2 Plans, following a survey that had been carried out among 7 Armoured Brigade. It is disappointing that we were not told about its existence.

One of the matters that the major was asked to examine was troops' reluctance to become decisively engaged when the rules of engagement clearly allowed them to do so. The findings were pretty emphatic.

"Confidence to open fire. All agreed that there was a certain British reticence to open fire, and that this was largely a positive feature at the start of an operational deployment... However, there remained a common belief that many soldiers lack the confidence to initiate opening fire when it is tactically and legally sound to do so. Reasons for this were given in the following approximate priority order:

(a) fear of investigation. There is a widespread fear of being investigated for having opened fire, and of a protracted prosecution system that might ensue. Some believed that individual soldiers would not open fire as a result of this fear. More typically, it was felt that soldiers would open fire, but only within the strictest interpretation of the ROE...

(b) Inconsistencies in ROE training. Throughout PDT"— that is, pre-deployment training—

"units have received differing advice on what level of force is suitable in a given situation, usually due to different understandings of the "imminency" of the threat being faced by the soldier, or borne from experiences on other operations with different policies."

Mr. Kevan Jones: Is not this a great example of the innuendoes, half-truths and hearsay that the hon. Gentleman and Lord Boyce are peddling? This is having an effect on our armed forces that is, frankly, not very helpful. May I refer the hon. Gentleman back to Lord Boyce's response to my question? He said:

"I do not have any which I can give the Committee Chairman."

In other words, he did not have any factual evidence that legal encirclement had actually stopped armed forces taking part in any activities. I say to the hon. Gentleman: stop peddling this, because it is damaging our armed forces.

Mr. Howarth: I suggest that the Prime Minister give the hon. Gentleman a seat on the Front Bench as a prize for his extreme loyalty.

8.30 pm

Mr. Touhig: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Prime Minister deprived me of a seat on the Front Bench. I am, however, somewhat disappointed by his remarks. Does he recall that the Committee saw a video, which gave details of how our troops are instructed on the rules of engagement, and that we were able to ask questions of officials and people who had served on the front line, and none of the issues that he raises came up? I share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) that this House and the other place must be careful about giving credence to half-innuendos that affect the morale of our people. It is all right for us sitting on these comfortable green Benches; we are not in Iraq tonight.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right that we saw the film, which raised several questions, including that of the limitations on when servicemen can open fire. I do not want take the House through all the scenarios involved at this time of night, but I hope that he will agree that certain reservations were expressed by several hon. Members. I think that that film could be improved a great deal.

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will not do so now, as I am trying to describe something. In that film, we saw guards on a ship at night, who heard a sound, and fire was offered. They went to investigate, and the "enemy" took off in an inflatable and were seen disappearing. The guards were not allowed to shoot them because they were not under immediate threat. One Member raised the point that while they were not under immediate threat, the enemy might have been about to offer immediate threat to some of their fellow servicemen. This is a difficult area, and the hon. Member for Islwyn is right to raise it. A lot more work needs to be done on that.

To return to the substance, I raised the issue of the survey because it has already gone into the public domain; extracts of it were published in The Sunday Telegraph a couple of weeks ago. I have made inquiries among those who are currently serving, and I understand that a great effort has been made to try to encourage and build confidence among those on the front line that they might open fire with confidence. To the extent that that has been done—according to an insider whose word I trust implicitly—I am encouraged. I make no apology for repeating something that has already appeared in a newspaper, perhaps at greater length, as it illustrates the risk that we face if we do not back up our people, and how easy it is for them to lose the confidence that is essential if they are to be able to fight the fight on our behalf and to save their own lives. If they fail to open fire out of reticence and lose their lives, we will have betrayed and failed them, as the whole House will agree. We must get the balance of judgment right.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend is making a powerful speech. Several Members have put this issue in the wider context of a litigious society. May I remind him and the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) that in introducing the Compensation Bill to deal with such wider civil effects, no one in the Government, even when saying that it is purely a matter of perceptions, ever sought to blame those in the scouting movement and other areas who have complained for somehow stirring up innuendo?

Mr. Howarth: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Time is marching on. I suspect that we will not be able to debate one of the new clauses relating to the creation of an armed forces federation. To reinforce my earlier point, let me quote from The Sunday Times yesterday, which reported on the setting up of the British armed forces federation. It quoted Professor Richard Holmes, who is universally admired by all of us who have an interest in defence, as saying:

"Politicians control what senior officers say more than they did in the past".

He continued:

"They simply can't say what the problems might be. Someone has to do that."

That is his support for the armed forces federation, which I happen to be against, so I am afraid that I am on the wrong side of him on that matter. However, the report goes on to say:

"Many service members believe comrades accused of war crimes in Iraq, who were later found not guilty, were 'hung out to dry' by the government."

That is the perception out there. I certainly do not accuse the Minister of State, whom I know extremely well, but whose constituency I cannot remember—

Mr. Ingram: East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow.

Mr. Howarth: Of course. I apologise. I accept that he and his hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn are committed to the armed forces. It is, however, imperative that we understand the culture of the military, and the vital importance—mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Newark—of ensuring that our people out there feel they have the support of not just the political commanders, but the chain of command.

The hon. Member for Islwyn—the former Minister whom the Prime Minister obviously thought too old to be veterans Minister—sought to assure me that there would be detailed guidance. I do not doubt his word for a moment, but let me say this to his successor. Clause 116 clearly states what happens after an investigation. It could not be more explicit; indeed, it could not be more pedantic. Subsection (2) says that if "a service policeman considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge a person with a Schedule 2 offence"

—that is, a serious offence—

"he must refer the case to the Director of Service Prosecutions".

We are absolutely clear about the role of the service policeman. It is perfectly all right to specify that in the Bill. However, we are told that it cannot be specified in the Bill that the commanding officer will be empowered both to make representations and to be told of the outcome of the service policeman's investigation.

I am sorry, but I must insist that that is not correct. It is fine to be prescriptive about the role of the service policeman, but I do not think it acceptable to argue that we cannot be prescriptive about the role of the commanding officer. The commanding officer is central to the whole concept of the chain of command, and to the protection of the men under his command. Unless the Minister is prepared to say that he will deal with that in the other place, I am afraid that I will seek to persuade the Committee to vote against the clause.

Mr. Watson: A powerful case has been put for each side of the argument. I intend to explain clause 116, and then try to deal with some of the key points that have been raised.

The clause determines to whom a service policeman refers a case once he has investigated it. It also determines to whom a service police force refers a case that has been referred to it by a United Kingdom or overseas civilian police force. Its purpose is to ensure that the most serious or sensitive cases are referred to the service prosecuting authority.

Subsection (2) requires a service policeman who considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge a person with a schedule 2 offence—that is, one of the most serious offences—to refer the case directly to the prosecuting authority without first passing it to the person's commanding officer. When a service policeman considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge the person with another offence in the context of circumstances "prescribed by regulations", he will also have to refer the case to the prosecuting authority. When the offence is not covered by schedule 2, and no prescribed circumstances apply but the service policeman considers that there is sufficient evidence to charge the person with some other offence, subsection (3) requires that it be passed to the person's commanding officer.

Subsection (4) requires a service policeman to consult the prosecuting authority before referring a person to his or her commanding officer if it was originally thought that a schedule 2 offence might have been committed, or that prescribed circumstances might exist. That ensures that in such a case the service police's decision on whether there are sufficient grounds for the case to be referred to the prosecuting authority will be made on the advice of the prosecuting authority.

Many Members have raised specific points. First, let me deal with the "risk-averse" points. We have heard a number of quotations from Lord Boyce and various others. If I understand the argument correctly, what is being suggested is that clause 116 will create a politically correct brigade of lawyers who will be profoundly challenging to the roles played by service personnel. The argument is that personnel will be more risk-averse in the field of combat and in operations, and that they will be inhibited from operating effectively in theatre. I understand those arguments, but on reading the transcript of the debate in Committee, I wanted to test the issue for myself. Last week, I visited the Coldstream Guards and asked them whether they felt inhibited by the rules of engagement and thought that a new culture was developing in the forces. Their commanding officer afforded me time to talk to infantrymen who had been on the front line, and from their CO down I did not get that impression.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The Coldstream Guards were based in Aldershot until last year, and they returned from Iraq after a difficult tour. Their padre is a close friend of mine. I spoke to several warrant officers in the sergeants' mess, and there is no doubt that some of them felt inhibited. I sought to say that an authority whom I regard as one of integrity told me that the position had improved, but the Minister will accept that the survey carried out on the 7th Armoured Brigade at the end of November and the beginning of December, and some of the remarks that have been made, indicate that there has been a problem.

Mr. Watson: The hon. Gentleman and I will have to draw different conclusions from the conversations that we have had. That was not said to me when I was in the sergeants' mess, and when I talked to the infantrymen to test out this issue they gave no impression that they felt inhibited. I asked the commander who conducted our forces in Basra whether he felt inhibited by the rules of engagement, and he said, "No, not at all." So the hon. Gentleman and I have obviously had different conversations.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I, too, visited the Coldstream Guards, and undertook other such visits relating to the Bill with the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). In my four visits to Iraq and on the various visits that I undertook with the Select Committee, I did not come across anyone—be it an infantry person or someone in a more senior position—who said that they were risk-averse in the way that has been described. Unfortunately, even when evidence is put before the hon. Gentleman, he cannot come to terms with it.

Mr. Watson: The only example that I have seen of someone being prepared to go on the record on this issue is Lord Boyce.

Let me try to reassure the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) with another quotation about the rules of engagement:

> "Whenever you see an armed British serviceman or woman on duty, you can be confident that they will live—maybe die—by the rules that are drilled and trained into them and which make them the most professional forces in the world. It is all about using no more force than is necessary, using firearms as a last resort and only to protect human life, only firing aimed shots, no more rounds than are necessary and taking precautions to hit only the target...Believe you me, the Army knows what it is doing. The Rules of Engagement have stood the test of time and they are right."

Those are the words of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key), who, sadly, cannot be here tonight. They are on his website, and if I can feel reassured by those words, I hope that the hon. Member for Aldershot can.

Mr. Howarth: I think that there has been a slight misunderstanding. There is no dispute about the nature of the rules of engagement. Indeed, one of our proposals was to include them in the Bill, so that compliance with them would be sufficient protection against prosecution. There are certain issues in that regard, which I have raised with the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), but the serious question is whether people will be prosecuted. Concern that they might have exceeded the rules of engagement could damage them psychologically and affect their ability to be operationally effective; at worst, it could risk their losing their lives.

Mr. Watson: That concern is obviously not borne out by the hon. Member for Salisbury. The Coldstream Guards to whom I talked last week did not share it, either, so the hon. Member for Aldershot and I will have to disagree on this issue.

Mr. Brazier: My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) quoted the survey leaked by The Sunday Telegraph. Does the Minister believe that that survey was properly founded? Why did that survey have to be leaked? When we had a Conservative Government, the regular surveys of a range of attitudes were available at any time on request by Members.

8.45 pm

Mr. Watson: The hon. Gentleman will know that I cannot comment on that survey. I have not seen it and, if it was leaked, we do not comment on leaked documents. However, I will try to review the press article after the debate and if I can learn something from it I will contact him.

The hon. Member for Aldershot made several points about the role of the prosecuting authority and the commanding officer. I know that he has expressed concern that if a serious offence were alleged, it would be investigated by the service police and the case passed to the service prosecuting authority without an opportunity for the commanding officer to explain the service context to the prosecuting authority. In fact, the Bill will not substantially change the present position, which hon. Members seek to preserve. I do not underestimate the seriousness with which hon. Members have made the point, but the service police will of course be able to consult the CO.

I shall explain why the concerns expressed, especially by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), are not founded. He said that the Bill would strip away a statutory obligation. To take the Army as an example, nothing in the Army Act 1955 provides a right for COs or higher authority to submit a report to the Army Prosecuting Authority setting out the military circumstances that prevailed. That right is covered by regulation.

Mr. Brazier: We are now in a much more litigious era, with a well-briefed enemy who is clever at working out fresh ways to make life difficult for our armed forces. The Bill will change the situation from one in which the CO has the powers to dismiss charges to one in which he is merely expected to be consulted. The Minister and his predecessor have been happy to make promises on the Floor of the House, so what is stopping the Government providing the comfort of putting them in the Bill?

Mr. Watson: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument—he has made it on three or four occasions. I shall try to answer that point. At present, there is provision in regulations for the commanding officer to submit to higher authority any information in his possession, in addition to other details, which—in his opinion—may be material to the institution of court martial or other proceedings. The higher authority is required to forward that material to the prosecuting authority when forwarding a case from the commanding officer. What use it makes of that information, if any, is entirely a matter for the prosecuting authority.

Under the Bill, there is no prohibition on commanding officers providing the same information as they do now. They will be aware of police investigations and we would expect a similar provision to be in the regulations made under the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) said to the Select Committee, we acknowledge that in such cases a commanding officer may have valuable information that could assist the director in the test that he must apply before proceeding to charge individuals. A commanding officer will have to be made aware of such a case, because it will affect one of his people and the operational efficiency of his unit. Written guidance will set out the standard operating procedures under which the service police will be obliged to act in that regard. Even now, the service police send daily reports to commanding officers notifying them of all cases that they have begun to investigate. Notifying them of a case that has gone directly to the prosecuting authority will be a matter of course and we do not need to legislate for that process.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: One benefit of these proceedings is that all those comments are being written into the record, but I cannot understand why the Minister and his advisers are so loth to put something prescriptive into the Bill when they are perfectly prepared to include the words:

"If an officer of a prescribed description becomes aware of circumstances of a prescribed description, he must as soon as is reasonably practicable ensure that a service police force is aware of the matter."

Why not put on the face of the Bill that the commanding officer shall be informed of the outcome of the investigation, or that the commanding officer may—permissive, not mandatory—inform the director of service prosecutions of the military context?

Mr. Watson: There is no need to include such a provision, as I shall explain. It is inconceivable that a commanding officer would not want to take up their right to submit circumstances to a prosecuting authority.

In the remaining time available, I want to deal with some of the more detailed points that the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) made so powerfully. He spoke of the need for powers to deal with serious offences during operations, which is probably the most serious point in our debate on these matters. Perhaps my explanation of the current situation will inform his conclusions in the Lobby later.

UK forces developed a shooting investigation policy for high-tempo operations in Iraq that was so successful that they adopted the same model in Afghanistan. It has led to fewer but better targeted service police investigations. It allows COs to decide that there is no suggestion of an offence and to delay service police investigation until the operational tempo permits it. Nothing in the Bill is inconsistent with that procedure.

Under the Bill, the CO will still have to make the service police aware of serious offences as soon as is possible and reasonably practicable. I hope that that assures the hon. Gentleman that we will not draw people away from high-tempo operations during important tours of duty.

Patrick Mercer: The Minister has generously answered my point, as far as it goes. I am grateful for his indication that it is at the heart of the debate, because the crux of the matter is that in operational circumstances such as those which prevailed for the 2nd Royal Tank Regiment, the case of Trooper Williams, until it was satisfactorily dealt with—by the CO in that case—seriously worried the rest of the regiment and caused operational ineffectiveness. If the powers to deal with such things during high-tempo operations were stripped away from COs, it could interfere with the operational effectiveness of units at that level.

Mr. Watson: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I would rather not be drawn into discussion of the case of Trooper Williams, which is extremely detailed. The point that I was trying to make is that we will not be drawing people away from their immediate operational effectiveness.

I cannot comment on individual cases, but I suspect that one feature of the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Canterbury was the delay in resolving the matter. Service chiefs and all members of the armed forces share concern about such delays. The regime that we are introducing will ensure that matters that ought to go to the prosecuting authority move far more quickly than at present. The closer relationship between the service police and the prosecuting authority should help to improve the quality of the investigation. All those factors will contribute to reducing such delays.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the clause would prevent service police from consulting a CO.

Mr. Brazier: I did not suggest that the clause would prevent service police from consulting COs, but that it says that they should refer a case directly, which means that they could shove it on without consulting the CO.

Mr. Watson: Let me explain what currently happens. The clause will not prevent any service police from consulting the CO about the case in deciding whether there is sufficient evidence of an offence before sending the case to the director of service prosecutions. Where the service context is relevant to whether an offence has been committed, the service police not only may, but should, ensure that they understand that context. However, if they decide that there is sufficient evidence, the CO should not be able to stop the DSP considering the case.

I have tried to answer as many of the detailed points about the clause as I possibly can. Obviously, I will review Hansard tomorrow, and if I can help hon. Members further when I have looked at it, I will. With those assurances, I calmly attempt to reassure the hon. Member for Aldershot that the clause is not worth dividing the Committee.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I made it clear at the outset, as did my hon. Friends, that the clause goes to the heart of the Bill and reflects some of the most significant changes to our procedures under the existing individual service Acts. We have sought not only to set out some of the concerns that we feel exist, but to make the case that if the Government feel so strongly that what we are saying is already current practice, it ought to be stated in the Bill.

I am sorry to disagree with the hon. Gentleman on his first outing as the Minister, but I feel very strongly about the issue. I have made the case in the Select Committee, I have the support of my hon. Friends, and we are disappointed that the Government feel unable to make such a change or, indeed, to offer us any possible change, not even further consideration before the Bill goes to another place. Therefore, I am afraid to say—with no personal disrespect to the Minister—that I am not satisfied and that I will invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the clause standing part of the Bill.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I am not clear whether that was an intervention.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Sir Michael, can I help?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. Has the Minister finished his contribution?

Mr. Watson indicated assent.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I see.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendment made: No. 3, in page 267, line 25, at end insert—

'Rehabilitation of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 (S.I. 1978/1908 (N.I. 27))

63A In Article 2 of the Rehabilitation of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 (interpretation), in paragraph (2), in the definition of "service disciplinary proceedings", after "any of the following—" insert—

"(za) any proceedings (whether or not before a court) in respect of a service offence within the meaning of the Armed Forces Act 2006 (except proceedings before a civilian court within the meaning of that Act);".

63B In Article 4 of that Order (rehabilitation of persons dealt with in service disciplinary proceedings), after paragraph (1) insert—

"(1A) Section 369(1) to (3) of the Armed Forces Act 2006 ("conviction" and "sentence" in relation to summary hearings and the SAC) apply for the purposes of this Order as they apply for the purposes of that Act."

63C (1) Article 6 of that Order (rehabilitation periods for particular sentences) is amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph (1)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (c) omit the "and" at the end;

(b) in sub-paragraph (d) omit "or a corresponding court-martial punishment";

(c) after that sub-paragraph insert—

"(e) a sentence of detention for life, or for a term exceeding thirty months, passed under section 208 of the Armed Forces Act 2006;

(f) a sentence of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure under section 217 of that Act; and

(g) any of the following passed as a result of any of sections 218 to 221 of that Act—

(i) a sentence of imprisonment for public protection under section 225 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003;

(ii) a sentence of detention for public protection under section 226 of that Act;

(iii) an extended sentence under section 227 or 228 of that Act;".

(3) In paragraph (2)—

(a) in Table A, in the fifth entry for "Any sentence of detention" substitute "Any sentence of service detention within the meaning of the Armed Forces Act 2006, or any sentence of detention corresponding to such a sentence,";

(b) in Table B—

(i) in the fourth entry, after "1998" insert "or under section 288 of the Armed Forces Act 2006";

(ii) in the fifth entry, after "Article 45" insert "or that section 288".

(4) After paragraph (4) insert—

"(4A) Where in respect of a conviction an order under section 210 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 (detention and training order) was made, the rehabilitation period applicable to the sentence shall be—

(a) in the case of a person aged 15 or over on conviction, five years if the order was for a term exceeding six months, or three and a half years if it was for six months or less;

(b) in the case of a person aged under 15 on conviction, a period beginning with the date of conviction and ending one year after the date on which the order ceases to have effect.

(4B) Where in respect of a conviction a service community order under the Armed Forces Act 2006 or an overseas community order under that Act was made, the rehabilitation period applicable to the sentence shall be—

(a) in the case of a person aged 18 or over on conviction, 5 years from the date of conviction;

(b) in the case of a person aged under 18 on conviction, two and a half years from the date of conviction or a period beginning with the date of conviction and ending when the order ceases to have effect, whichever is the longer."

(5) In paragraph (9)—

(a) omit sub-paragraph (a);

(b) in sub-paragraph (c) after "1998" insert "or section 288 of the Armed Forces Act 2006".

(6) After paragraph (9) insert—

"(9A) In this Article—

(a) references in paragraphs (1) and (2) to section 288 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 include references to section 71A(4) of the Army Act 1955 or Air Force Act 1955 or section 43A(4) of the Naval Discipline Act 1957;

(b) the reference in paragraph (1) to section 217 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 includes a reference to section 71A(3) of the Army Act 1955 or Air Force Act 1955 or section 43A(3) of the Naval Discipline Act 1957."

(7) In the Schedule to that Order (service disciplinary convictions referred to in Article 7(6)(b)), after paragraph 6 add—

"Provisions of the Armed Forces Act 2006

7 Any service offence within the meaning of the Armed Forces Act 2006 except one punishable in the case of an offender aged 18 or over with imprisonment for more than two years." —[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

	In Article 6, in paragraph (1), the word "and" at the end of sub-paragraph (c), and in sub-paragraph (d) the words "or a corresponding court-martial punishment", and paragraph (9)(a)".

Schedule 17, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 372 to 378 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Order for Third Reading read.

9.17 pm

Mr. Watson: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am delighted and slightly relieved to stand at the Dispatch Box this evening with the task of sending the Bill on its way to another place. I should like to pay sincere tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), who was responsible for introducing the Bill. He is a great parliamentarian and a good friend. His deep regard and support for the armed forces are well respected by Members on both sides of the House. His open and consensual approach to the Bill, which helped the Select Committee to conduct its businesses effectively, were widely welcomed. I am indebted to him, and I am very grateful indeed for his authoritative and constructive contribution to our debate. On a personal note, I thank him for the support that he has given me.

I pay tribute to members of the Select Committee, which was chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth). Many of them have made sincere contributions today with the common purpose of ensuring that we introduce legislation that can better meet the needs of the 21st century. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) has been gracious to me on my first run-out—I am sure that he could have been harder. He mentioned his former colleague and very good friend, Eric Forth. I remember Eric with admiration, having been a Friday Whip before assuming my new role. One thing that Eric pioneered was in-flight refuelling during debate. Some of my hon. Friends have been good at in-flight refuelling this afternoon. I will not name them, but they have my grateful thanks.

I am sure the House will join me in sending good wishes for a speedy recovery to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key), who cannot be with us this evening. He served on the Select Committee on the Bill, and made a significant contribution to it.

I place on record my thanks to the staff of my new private office, and the Bill team in particular, who did not quite take away the sleepless nights, but they helped with detailed briefings throughout the afternoon. They know what they did and, if it is not out of order, I offer them a small drink after the debate.

We have had a good debate. I shall not cover old ground, but I shall mention my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen). We crossed swords for a couple of hours, especially over what constituted the definition of an enemy. Never has Churchill's quote been so valid—enemy behind, opposition in front. My hon. Friend may have defined his enemy this afternoon, but I hope he will be my friend at the end of the debate.

Although my time as Minister responsible for the Bill has been brief, it falls to me to mark an important stage in its progress. I will not detain the House unduly, but I shall say a few words about the Bill. It is a good Bill.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): My hon. Friend spoke a moment ago about going over old ground. May I ask him to cover some new ground? He will be studying the review by Nicholas Blake QC of the events at Deepcut. A key recommendation from Nicholas Blake is the establishment of an armed forces ombudsman. Perhaps as the debate on the Bill continues in another place, my hon. Friend will consider that important recommendation to make sure that the Bill deals with all the concerns that people have about the armed forces.

Mr. Watson: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes. She concerns herself in great detail with the Bill. We take the Blake review extremely seriously. Although I am new in the position, the Department hopes to respond shortly. I am sure my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to express her views in her usual way.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I do not wish to detain the Minister, but he will accept that the hon. Lady's view is shared on a cross-party basis? The parents of those who lost their offspring at Deepcut Army barracks will feel disappointed that on Report the Minister and others did not get to discuss the recommendations of the Blake inquiry. Can he give the House an assurance that he takes the concerns of the parents seriously, and that there will be continuing discussion to see if we can bring about closure for the parents, albeit with the possible revelation of some as yet undisclosed reports?

Mr. Watson: I share the hon. Gentleman's disappointment. The matter is serious and will not go away at the end of the evening. I take his point on board.

The Bill marks an historic change for the armed forces. In a sense, the most important test of its value is the support that it has from the armed forces. The services have been central to the development of the Bill. The clear modern drafting is a testament to the skills of parliamentary counsel. The chiefs of staff, commanding officers and men and women of all ranks have supported the Bill.

It is right that we should replace the three service discipline Acts—the Army Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955 and the Naval Discipline Act 1957—which provided the legal basis for service discipline for so many years. Importantly, when enacted the Bill will deliver the undertaking that the Government gave in 1998 in their strategic defence review to introduce a single system of service law. Under this legislation, for the first time, we will have a single system that will apply to all three services at all times and wherever they are in the world; nor should we forget the civilians who accompany them overseas.

The Bill recognises a world in which the three services increasingly train and operate together, but equally it will underpin the maintenance of discipline through the chain of command that is so fundamental to the operational effectiveness of our armed forces in which we all take such pride. We have listened to Members and made some sensible amendments. This is still work in progress, as we have said. The Government will take the opportunity during the Bill's passage in another place to bring forward any further amendments to ensure that we give the armed forces the best possible system that we can.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I join the Minister in thanking those who have contributed over the last four or five months to our deliberations on these matters. It is true that the Bill team has been working even longer;—I think for 18 months. I should remind the House that when the House last debated this matter in 1955, the Select Committee took two years. I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that hon. Members on both sides of the Select Committee have undertaken in four or five months that which our predecessor Committee in the 1950s took two years to undertake. That seems like a productivity enhancement to me.

I should also like to pay tribute, as I have done already, to the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) for all the help behind the scenes that he gave, and to the Minister I am bound to say, "A very good opening performance," and I hope that he will take some confidence from that. I also hope that he will accept that he has one of the best jobs in the Government in representing and acting on behalf of some of the finest men and women in our country.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, said that consideration had now been completed, but consideration of the Bill has not been completed. We have not been able to discuss a number of amendments. The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) had tabled a new clause about an ombudsman that we were unable to discuss, and we had some concerns over service panels and the make-up of the court martial panels. We also had a concern that the director of service prosecutions must have a military background, and there were other issues as well. So unfortunately we will bid the Bill farewell to another place not fully considered here, and I hope that some of those points will be taken up there.

One of the most important points about the Bill is the way in which it has been considered. The Select Committee procedure has been hugely beneficial, and the Committee so found in its report and recommended that the Government should consider applying the technique to other Bills. I have no doubt, seeing in her place the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry), who participated assiduously in our proceedings, that it was extremely beneficial to all of us, however much experience we had of the military. We all took away a huge amount from the opportunity of being able to cross-examine people before us and make the visits. The Committee was better informed as a result. We may not all have heard the same things or interpreted what we heard in quite the same way, but the fact that we made those visits and held those proceedings was beneficial.

It was always difficult for the Opposition given that the service chiefs had all signed up to the legislation. It ill behoves an acting pilot officer to question the Chief of the Air Staff, let alone the Chief of the Defence Staff, about whether he has got it right or not, but I would be quite interested to know in exactly how much detail each of the defence chiefs read the legislation.

As I have said, the Opposition's approach was to look at the Bill from the point of view of how it will affect our armed forces on the front line, not so much how they will deal with discipline at home in Aldershot or Colchester. The debate about the chain of command and the power of commanding officers illustrated our genuine concerns about the administration of discipline, particularly where servicemen and women are felt to have acted outside the rules of engagement.

It is good news that the Government have accepted the need for annual renewal. I thank the hon. Member for Islwyn for having acceded to that change, which is incorporated in the Bill. That welcome provision will give the House an opportunity to revisit how the changes are bedding down.

The Minister has referred to the Bill's tri-service nature, which is widely accepted as being the desirable way to go. However, one of the things that came out of our visits to Cyprus, Oman and Iraq is that each of the armed forces fights differently and has an individual ethos. Paragraph 39 on page 13 of the Committee's report makes the important point that > "The way each Service fights is different and the Bill needs to accommodate those differences".

We want to see everything in terms of joint operations, but that is not necessarily the case, because, as an old boy has said, many sailors will never work alongside a soldier or airman throughout their whole military career. Some of those differences came out during our visits, and I hope that the Minister will reflect on how the Bill can be made to fit the individual service ethos—the desire of the chiefs to make the default position on courts martial panels single service is a good starting point.

The Opposition have also taken the view that this body of military law is essential. We agree with the Judge Advocate General that the military should be governed by completely different law from that which applies to civilians. I hope that we have managed to accommodate the changes to civilian law to the extent that they will not damage the operational effectiveness of the armed forces.

As a sideswipe at the European convention on human rights, I was concerned to be told during our proceedings in Select Committee that although the Bill is compatible with the ECHR, that is no bar to further challenges. I personally take the view that the European Court of Human Rights should have nothing to do with how the United Kingdom disposes of its armed forces. The protection of the members of our armed forces and their arrangements should be exclusively a matter for this Parliament and not for some court composed of a collection of foreigners. I feel very strongly about that matter.

The test which we must apply to our deliberations over the past few months is whether we have provided our armed forces with a legal framework that will do them the justice that they undoubtedly deserve. There is not an hon. Member in this House, even among those who have spoken against the war in Iraq, who has anything other than unbounded admiration for our armed forces, and I hope that we have fashioned a law that will help them, protect them and enable them to do their magnificent work on behalf of the entire nation.

I shall conclude with the military covenant, which is quoted on page 6 of our report and which sets out the Army's doctrine:

> "Soldiers differ from civilian employees because success in military operations, when the price of failure may be death, requires the subordination of the rights of the individual to the needs of the task and the team, albeit within a legal framework."

I hope that we have discharged our responsibility to the men and women of our armed forces to their satisfaction.

9.34 pm

Mr. Touhig: I know the Armed Forces Bill as an old friend, having taken it through its Committee stages with a number of colleagues. In rising to speak from the Back Benches, I feel a little like the ghost of Christmas past.

Let me begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary on his appointment. I know that he will do an excellent job. I am sure that Members on both sides of the House will agree that having come into the job at such short notice he has done a very good job during today's debate. While I pass on the baton of Veterans Minister with considerable regret, I am happy to hand over to my hon. Friend some of the work in the red boxes. I am grateful to him and to other Members for their kind comments about my time as Minister, particularly so far as this Bill is concerned. I am conscious that the first contribution from a recently retired Minister may at times be an uncomfortable experience for those on the Front Bench, but I can put my hon. Friends at ease. I will enjoy my freedom from the security of collective responsibility by making it plain that I wholeheartedly support the Bill.

With the strategic defence review in 1998, the Government recognised that we needed a single system of service law for today's armed forces. Our forces increasingly train and operate together, and they need a modern system of justice that reflects that. The Bill is the result of years of hard and dedicated work, and the services themselves have been at the centre of its development. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence said on Second Reading that this is a Bill that has at its centre the armed forces themselves. In that sense, it is a Bill for the armed forces. It has their full support, primarily because it meets their needs in a way that has been absent for some time.

I turn to the way in which the Bill has been handled, as referred to by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). I should like to add my thanks to the Bill team for their professional and dedicated support. When I was Minister, I knew at first hand that they did a tremendous job and that that was not often recognised enough. The special Select Committee procedure is a regular feature of the quinquennial review of service discipline. As has been demonstrated, it has been an outstandingly successful arrangement for the House. The evidence taken by the Committee, in what we might term the Select Committee stage, gave Members the opportunity better to understand the purposes behind the Bill.

The combination of that expert testimony and line-by-line scrutiny in Committee means that this Bill has been considered in a far greater depth than many others. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), who chaired the Committee with his customary blend of patience and purpose. He was ably assisted by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key), who has served on several special Select Committees considering service legislation. Indeed, his experience led me at one stage to consider asking him to join the Bill team, because I thought that he would make a considerable contribution. I join with all Members in wishing him a speedy recovery and return to the House.

In Committee and in the early debates in the House and today, as well as in the media, I fear that we have heard a great deal of nonsense about our armed forces being under some sort of legal siege that is affecting the chain of command and blighting operational effectiveness. To me, "legal siege" is a loose, vague, woolly and wholly misleading term. As a concept it lacks intellectual rigour, and as a description it lacks a grounding in fact. I do not mean to say that certain perceptions do not exist in some quarters, although when reading some of the newspaper reports I am reminded of Nye Bevan, who, when asked whether he read the newspapers, said that of course he did because it was his one continuous source of fiction.

I consider the so-called legal siege to be a mirage. The former Chief of the Defence Staff, the noble and gallant Lord Boyce, who has been much quoted today, could not give a single real example of how this intangible concept is supposedly affecting operational effectiveness. During the Select Committee stage, when asked by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), the then Chief of the Defence Staff, General Sir Michael Walker, gave the same reply:

"If you ask me to give you a physical concrete example, I cannot."

I would remind Members of some wise words that we heard in the Committee's hearings, which I quoted earlier:

"I am sure that we all could play a better role in trying to dampen down this particular worry, and people like myself who are standing up and speaking in the House of Lords debates and so forth perhaps need to re-look at how we are saying things in order not to fuel anxieties of this nature."

Those were the words of Admiral Lord Boyce himself, and I was grateful for his candour when he gave us that evidence in Committee.

Perception stems from what is said in this place and in the press. If it is said often enough, it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. Members—of this House and the other place—should be more temperate in their comments, otherwise they feed a perception that undermines the morale of our forces.

We have had much discussion in Standing Committee and this evening on the role of commanding officer. I should like to conclude by making it plain that the Bill has the support of the forces and that the changes that we are making to the role of the commanding officer will be supported and welcomed. Indeed, many of our forces have welcomed the removal of the power to dismiss serious charges. I have a high regard for General Sir Mike Jackson, and he put it perfectly:

"As far as the Army is concerned, I would echo the fundamental place of the Commanding Officer in holding good order and military discipline and we are content that the new Bill secures that position. There have been changes but they are not changes which we think in any way are significantly detrimental to that pole position which we would wish the Commanding Officer to hold."

I subscribe to his remarks.

When we considered harmonising the powers of commanding officers, naval captains had perhaps most to lose. It was once said of the Navy in Nelson's time that on board ship, the captain was second only to God, and that was only a matter of seniority. The Bill updates powers in the age of e-mail and satellite communications, and the then First Sea Lord made it clear when he gave evidence to our Committee that he was entirely happy with what has been retained. The changes in the Bill allow commanding officers to get on with what they do best: commanding, training and looking after the men and women under their command.

As I said on Second Reading, we place an enormous responsibility on the shoulders of our servicemen and women. We ask them to operate in circumstances that are often difficult, unpredictable and dangerous. We ask them to perform tasks that have no parallel in the civilian world. When young men and women sign on to serve in our armed forces, they know that they may face circumstances in which they put their lives on the line. That does not happen to those who join Barclays bank or Tesco. It is the peculiar and special position of those who join our armed forces. Sometimes, they make the ultimate sacrifice. We have again recently mourned the deaths of our young servicemen and women in Iraq.

Parliament and the armed forces demand high standards of behaviour from our forces, whether overseas on operations or training at home. Discipline is essential and service law is essential to enforce it. Ultimately we all want an effective and efficient fighting force.

There is no doubt that we need a separate system of law for the armed forces and that it needs to reflect the increasingly joint nature of their work. The Bill delivers that. The forces want the measure. It will provide strong legislation for service discipline in the 21st century. I hope that it will have the wholehearted support of the other place and that it will soon be on the statute book.

9.42 pm

Bob Russell: I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig) for his past service as Under-Secretary. I believe that the Prime Minister has treated him shabbily by taking away the job after he piloted the [Bob Russell]

Bill almost to the finishing post. It is something when one is deemed, at 58, to be too old to be the Veterans Minister. However, I warmly welcome his replacement, the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson). As has been said, he performed spectacularly tonight and I wish him well in the future.

We welcome the Bill. It has been a long haul and it now goes to the other place, where there will be an opportunity to do the fine tuning that perhaps some people feel is still required. I join other speakers in thanking the Bill Committee team for all their work in briefing hon. Members and helping them through the various Committee stages. I say "various" because it is the first time that I have served on a Committee that evolved in such a way, through Standing and Select Committee structures. I found it very useful and informative, and I hope that it will become the pattern for future Bills.

The Bill will bring about the harmonisation of military disciplinary matters going back decades, if not centuries. It is not only the armed forces discipline Acts of 1955 and 1957—half a century ago—that are being updated. Certain measures go right back to the 19th century. It is right that, in the third millennium, we should have disciplinary procedures for the military that are fit for purpose, and that reflect the changing times and the increasing tendency for our armed forces to be on joint deployment, as we found when we visited British troops in Oman, Cyprus and Iraq as part of our investigation. I was impressed to see in Cyprus, for example, the military police from all three services working successfully as a single unit. In Iraq, we met helicopter pilots drawn from the RAF, the Army and the Navy working as a single unit. Joint deployment must not take away from the fact that each service has a special ethos, however. A naval helicopter pilot, for example, needs training and disciplines in maritime conditions, whereas those in the Army—such as those in 16 Air Assault Brigade from Colchester—need to operate rapid attack helicopters to get troops in at low level.

I was delighted that, in addition to visiting Iraq, Cyprus and Oman, the Committee had the good sense to visit the military corrective training centre at Colchester. It sets an example that the prison service could follow, in that it provides a good way of training young men—and, occasionally, young women—who have committed misdemeanours but who are nevertheless an important part of the military, and of getting them back into military service.

It is a special privilege to represent a garrison town, and I am particularly interested in the welfare of military discipline matters. We have heard a lot today about the command structure. In our garrison towns, we have garrison commanders. However, by the end of the year they will no longer be there, because the reconfiguration will result in brigade commanders taking over the role. I discovered that yesterday, and I also found, to my horror, that Colchester's garrison commander, Colonel Tony Barton, will no longer be there. In fact, he is leaving the service because he feels that he is being forced out. That cannot be right, because garrison commanders are all part of the chain of command, and garrison boundaries and brigade commanders' boundaries are not always coterminous. I foresee problems arising from this change.

I would like the Minister to comment on another matter, which I have raised in Committee. It is the potential conflict between Ministry of Defence police and the civilian police as a result of the growing tendency, following the forced privatisation of married quarters by the previous Tory Government, to sell the houses on. There is now uncertainty on one Army estate in Colchester as to what is military and what is civilian, and whether the MOD police or the civilian police should prevail. I am sure that the problem can be worked out, but it does need to be addressed.

I am disappointed that our debate today dragged on in the way that it did, because it meant that we did not reach the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay). However, I hope that his proposal will come back at another time in another place.

Will the Minister also confirm in his summing up that the disciplinary procedures will apply to the Gurkhas serving in the British Army? I mention that because I want to put on record that the United British Gurkhas Ex-servicemen's Association from Nepal presented a petition at No. 10 Downing street today about the injustices and unfairness suffered by those veterans. I hope that the Minister will confirm that today's Gurkhas will be treated on equal terms with the rest of the British Army.

One interesting aspect of military discipline that was new to all of us on the Committee was AGAI 67—it is just as well that the number was not two more than that. Anyway, it stands for Army general and administrative instructions, which are low-level disciplinary procedures that can be carried out by sergeants and corporals as a form of immediate disciplinary action. I understand that the Bill will enable the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force also to introduce AGAI 67 minor sanctions.

The Liberal Democrats support the Bill. It is important, however, that the ethos of the different services and the distinctiveness of the Army, Navy and Air Force are maintained and retained while at the same time harmonising disciplinary procedures, especially when we have joint deployments. I wish the Minister well as he takes the Bill through the House.

9.50 pm

Mrs. Humble: Like other Members, I want to compliment both the former and current Minister and the whole team involved in this important Bill. However, the legislation must not only satisfy the needs of the armed forces but the needs of families who, sadly, have lost children serving in the armed forces and in peacetime barracks. They, too, are looking for answers in the Bill.

The experience of Army life is of immense benefit to the overwhelming majority of young men and women able to take advantage of that career. At the same time, young soldiers are in a vulnerable position. Service life requires strict discipline and a tough regime. Sometimes, however, discipline and toughness become bullying and harassment. Our task is to minimise the opportunities for that to happen, and when it does, to provide a ready source of remedy to those so abused and harassed.

I referred earlier to Nicholas Blake QC, who undertook the inquiry into the deaths at Deepcut. Like him, I do not believe that the current proposals in the Bill go far enough to ensure independent supervision and review of the discipline and complaints system. Like him, I believe that there is "a danger that an historic opportunity will be lost for the Armed Forces to obtain independent assistance to achieve the goals they have set themselves to ensure the welfare of trainees and soldiers is effectively addressed."

I, too, believe that the "establishment of the office of a 'Commissioner of Military Complaints' is now an essential step in improving confidence, transparency and justice".

Regrettably, we did not have an opportunity to examine in detail new clause 4. When my hon. Friend the Minister considers the detail of the 34 recommendations that Nicholas Blake put forward, I urge him to consider especially his recommendation for an independent armed forces ombudsman—someone who is genuinely independent and has power to investigate complaints.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituent, Norma Langford, whose son, Corporal Ian Holt, died in Belize on non-combat duty in 1991, would be thrilled were such an independent inspectorate set up? At present, such investigations are usually left to the special investigation branch of the military police. She would like the whole system to be open and transparent.

Mrs. Humble: As chair of the all-party group on Army deaths, I have met my hon. Friend's constituent when she has attended meetings of the Deepcut and Beyond families group at Westminster. One of the most important things that I and other members of that group do is to meet families who have lost their loved ones. I am sure that Mrs. Langford would be pleased were such an armed forces commissioner and ombudsman set up.

I also advise my hon. Friend the Minister that Nicholas Blake says in his report that he has informally discussed the possible role of such a commissioner with commanding officers and others, and has understood that there is no objection in principle or practice to such independent oversight of the system, and nor is there concern that it will undermine military discipline. In further debate on this excellent Bill, I urge my hon. Friend to make it even better than it already is by introducing exactly such a system of independent oversight.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I welcome the Minister to his new role. I think that, given his performance today, he will be a formidable addition to the Defence team. I also welcome the process by which the Bill was examined. We went through reams of written evidence in the Select Committee, and also had an opportunity to examine witnesses. For me, however, one of the most important parts of the process was the Committee's visit to Cyprus, Oman and Iraq, where we were able to speak to the guys and girls on the ground who would be influenced by and subject to the Bill.

We ask our armed forces to operate in dangerous places and we ask them to put their lives at risk, so it is obvious that they must obey orders from their commanding officers. It emerged clearly today that we cannot allow people to operate like maverick losers. I think that the best way to prevent that is to foster team work, and to make a joint commitment to a common goal. Team work is much more likely to be generated by trust, transparency and openness than by operation as a secret closed group.

Two issues became very clear to me as we debated the Bill. One was the removal of the power of the commanding officer to dismiss a case, which has been much debated this evening. It was also discussed extensively with serving personnel during our visits. I do not accept that it damages the chain of command; I think that it enhances the reputation of our armed services. It represents a willingness not just to ensure that serious cases are investigated properly but to ensure that they are seen to be investigated properly, so that our armed services are held in the high esteem that we know they deserve, not just in this country but on the world stage.

The second issue is the duty of care and redress of complaints, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). We want our young people to choose the armed services as a valued career path where their capabilities will be stretched and their mettle will be tested, but where there is also a duty of care and an open and transparent redress procedure.

I represent a city with a long and proud history of its sons and daughters going to sea to defend our shores in armed service. I have a vested interest in ensuring the safety and security of my constituency, which in the past has been a military target, and in ensuring that my country is protected by an effective and professional armed service. However, I also have an interest in ensuring that individual serving soldiers, sailors and airmen are protected by a duty of care, and that potential recruits are not deterred by the perception of a bullying culture or complaints hidden under the carpet.

Despite the omission of an independent commissioner, which I hope will be discussed again when the Bill goes to another place, I believe that the Bill brings service discipline up to date. It reflects the modern world—the very different threats that face us and our armed services and the highly visible theatre in which they now operate, with "embedded" journalists and images posted on websites and television stations. I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the Bill's progress, and I hope that every Member will support it this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Guantanamo Bay

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

9.59 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to discuss detention without trial at Guantanamo Bay. I am pleased to see the Minister for the Middle East, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), on the Front Bench tonight, and I am glad that so many other Members of the House have taken such a strong interest in this subject. I am particularly pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) here, and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) hopes to join us later.

This is the fourth such debate to be held in the four years since the detention facility was established in early 2002, and the first since the release of the remaining British citizens a year ago. It takes place at an appropriate time—on the back of recent comments made by my right hon. and learned Friend Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney-General, and of the publication last Friday, just in time for this debate, of the United Nations convention against torture's critical report on Guantanamo.

Also on Friday, I was sorry to hear of reports by the BBC and other news agencies that four detainees attempted to commit suicide, and that the efforts of prison guards to stop those attempts were met by violent resistance from other inmates. Sadly, it now appears that prolonged exposure to the conditions within the facility have caused the inmates to look to suicide as the only alternative. With that in mind, the recent speech of the Attorney-General deserves even greater consideration.

On 10 May, the Attorney-General used a speech to the Royal United Services Institute to make clear his opposition to the continued detention without fair trial of those imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay. Lord Goldsmith stated that the camp should be closed "as a matter of principle". Although he made it clear that on this issue he was speaking in a personal capacity, as he is one of this country's foremost and most respected legal experts—and, indeed, the Government's chief legal adviser—his speech's significance cannot be underestimated. We all know of his intellectual prowess and determination. When he spoke, he meant what he said.

The Attorney-General's opinion is the most recent development concerning this subject. On 17 February, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and for Wales, my right hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), said that he would like to see the camp at Guantanamo Bay closed. Our Prime Minister, who has fostered an excellent relationship with the United States, has gone so far as to call the detention centre an "anomaly"—a view that he repeated at Question Time last week. Those three statements clearly reveal that the Government have not yet developed a coherent position on how the current situation should be resolved. Now is an excellent time for them to make such a statement.

Only two weeks ago, President Bush, during a visit to the United States by Chancellor Angela Merkel, stated his desire to end detention at Guantanamo and to get the detainees into court. As everyone appears concerned, why is Guantanamo still open? The opinion of such figures clearly shows that the arguments about what has become known as Camp X-Ray are progressing in the same direction. Guantanamo cannot continue. Detention without trial at Guantanamo is not a necessary part of the global fight against extremism and fundamentalism—also known as the war against terrorism. Rather, it is counter-productive to the efforts of the international community.

The tragic events of 11 September clearly demonstrated how vulnerable open and democratic societies are to the threat of organised terrorist networks. The subsequent military campaign in Afghanistan—fully supported by this Government, NATO and the United Nations—resulted in individuals suspected of belonging to the al-Qaeda network being captured by the American military forces. More than 600 of these alleged terrorists have been received in the detention facility since 2002. Although some 270 have since been released without charge, almost 500 still remain. These include 220 from Afghanistan, 119 from Saudi Arabia, 94 from Yemen, 57 from Pakistan and smaller numbers of men from 35 different countries. Although all eight British citizens have been released, there remain another eight men who claim to have long-term British residency permits.

I consider the United States to be a great friend and ally of this country, not merely through historical ties or present circumstances, but because of the very real values and interests that our countries share. As the Attorney-General remarked, the US is a great beacon of freedom, liberty and justice. That is the basis on which the strongest arguments can be made against the detention camp in its present form. Every day that those men are made to wait to face justice is a day that degrades the reputation of the US.

That reputation for fairness and equal treatment, whatever one's race, religion or ethnicity, is one of the greatest tools we have in the battle for the hearts and minds of millions across the world and in the face of propaganda by such organisations as al-Qaeda. In that context, the existence of Guantanamo Bay damages the efforts of the American and British Governments to isolate the terrorists and prevent them from recruiting further converts to their cause. It helps extremists to fuel perceptions that the US, and the west in general, targets Muslims and denies them their human rights.

The agenda of such extremist groups is obvious and can be discounted. What cannot be ignored is the list of independent and respected Governments and non-governmental organisations that have made clear their opposition to the camp's existence. The UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, has called for the camp's closure. Organisations such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch have been consistent in their condemnation. Amnesty is concerned at news of hunger strikes and suicide attempts by inmates and has called Guantanamo "a moral disgrace", an "emotional abyss" for those affected and "a legal black hole".

As I said earlier, it can be seen from the number of hon. Members in their places, including my hon. Friends the Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson), for Tooting, for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry), for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington and for Brent, South (Ms Butler), that this issue is of real concern. The legal arguments surrounding Guantanamo have become complex and polarised, with no consensus existing. None the less, it is a popular view, at least outside the US, that the basis for the detention camp rests on shaky legal foundations.

The right to fair trial without prolonged detention is a fundamental and well-established tenet of international law, which is explicit in articles 10 and 11 of the universal declaration of human rights and articles 14, 15 and 16 of the international covenant on civil and political rights. If it is argued that the laws of war apply, the Geneva convention has strict criteria governing the treatment that prisoners of war should receive.

The US Government argue that those prisoners are not in legal limbo but, pending a decision by the US Supreme Court, are nearing the time at which they will face trial before the military commission. Within the judicial process, it is claimed, the accused will have two opportunities to appeal to a fully civilian federal appeals court. However, that is not a reason to believe that the transportation of hundreds of individuals thousands of miles from their homelands and families and their imprisonment for years before trial is in any way justifiable.

Unfortunately, whatever the legal basis for the detention, the damage has been done. It is now a popular view in this country and other countries that the US Government have operated outside international law, with a clear disregard for the concerns of the international community and its closest friends.

In a series of statements from the State Department and the Department of Defence, the US has condemned the use of torture or inhumane techniques and pledged to prosecute any citizen found to have committed such acts. However, last week the United Nations committee against torture published its report on the detention policies of the US and judged them according to the convention against torture that the US ratified in 1994. The report concluded that the conditions for prisoners at Guantanamo Bay constituted torture and called for the camp to be closed as soon as possible.

Allegations of torture must be taken seriously. The right not to face torture or inhumane or degrading treatment is an absolute right. After the appalling images of torture at committed by soldiers at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, it is essential that the United States and our Government make every possible effort to make it clear that any such abuse is unacceptable and should not take place. Unfortunately, in the case of Guantanamo, the closed nature of the camp, where even UN officials were prevented from meeting detainees without first signing a confidentiality agreement, has ensured that serious allegations about treatment proliferate.

What we know comes from the American Army's Schmidt report, which details techniques also known as "torture lite". Many of sections of the Schmidt report are still censored, but it details techniques such as 18 to 20 hours a day of questioning for 48 in 54 days, blasting prisoners with strobe lights and ear-splitting rock music, the use of snarling dogs, threatening to hurt detainees' families and sexual humiliation. On that basis, I propose that a delegation of British parliamentarians be allowed to visit the detention complex in Guantanamo to assess the treatment of detainees. I should be grateful for the Minister's support for such a visit. If that is not possible, he should consider arranging a visit by our excellent Attorney-General so that he can assess the conditions of the detainees, as he has made his interest in the matter clear.

Sir Winston Churchill noted that America always does the right thing after exhausting every possible alternative. In the case of Guantanamo, our ally is running out of alternatives and I am sure that, in the fullness of time, Washington will indeed do the right thing. I call on the Minister and his Department to help to ensure that that happens sooner rather than later. In particular, will the Minister clarify his position about the continued imprisonment of eight individuals who claim to hold British residency?

On Thursday 5 May, representatives of two of those men lost a bid at the High Court to force the Foreign Secretary to intervene on their behalf. A Foreign Office spokesman said that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was unable to provide consular assistance to which is a very strict interpretation of the Foreign Office remit. British diplomatic influence is not solely limited to the protection of British citizens; it also applies to British interests, which include upholding the principle of inalienable human rights. For example, Abdul Rahman is an Afghanistani who, on conversion to Christianity, was threatened with the death penalty. At the time, the Minister was on the record as deeply troubled by the case and he sought urgent clarification from the Afghan authorities. I commend him for having done so. Mr. Rahman was not British; indeed, he was on the other side of the world at the time. Surely, that is a common precedent whereby the Government can represent our concerns about the men with British residency held at Guantanamo. Will the Minister make such representations?

"those who are not British citizens"—

The Prime Minister will be meeting President Bush later this week. I hope that he will use that visit to state the Government's concerns about the situation in Guantanamo Bay. Will the Minister confirm that that will happen?

I also ask the Minister whether he would consider positioning the UK in the role of co-ordinator for those countries that still have detainees imprisoned at Guantanamo. The UK's relationship with the United States and its experience of having a number of citizens detained at that facility for years would allow the Foreign Office to operate in that much-needed capacity. However, such measures would be only half a solution. The problem with Guantanamo Bay is the existence of the detention facility, the way that it operates and the image that it presents to the world. It runs counter to the fundamental values that we hold dear and wish to protect: the right to fair trail, the right not to be tortured or treated inhumanely and the belief in the strength of openness, transparency and accountability. I call on the Minister to support the view of the Attorney-General—Guantanamo Bay must close, and it must close now.

10.15 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) on securing the debate, and I welcome the opportunity to debate these issues today. First, I want to reiterate the Government's position on Guantanamo. We have made it clear that we regard the circumstances under which detainees continue to be held at Guantanamo Bay as unacceptable. The US Government know our views. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said as recently as four days ago, it would be better if Guantanamo were closed.

We continue to raise these concerns in our regular discussions on detainee-related issues with the US Government. We seek to ensure that the handling of detainees is consistent with the British Government's other objectives, including preventing further terrorist attacks, undermining the work of those who recruit terrorists and upholding respect for human rights and the rule of law. As we do so, let us reflect on the circumstances that led to Guantanamo Bay.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Howells: No, I am afraid not. If my hon. Friend will allow me, I have not much time in which to answer a very big contribution.

As my hon. Friend has reminded us, almost 3,000 people were killed during the terrorist attacks on 11 September 2001. As the Foreign Secretary told the Foreign Affairs Committee on 15 March, if September 11 had happened in this country rather than the United States, it would have changed our politics and security procedures just as it has changed those of the Americans.

It is also important to recognise the dilemma faced by the US Government in considering Guantanamo's future—how to balance collective security and respect individuals' human rights at the same time. More than 270 detainees have been moved from Guantanamo back to their home countries or their country of origin. Many more are being considered for the same, under arrangements designed to ensure that they will be treated humanely on their return. That is not an easy process; it will take time.

We expect the United States to be an example of fairness and justice, where civil liberties and human rights are protected and cherished. Sadly, they are not protected and cherished in some countries. Indeed, there are places where they hardly exist at all. The question is what happens to those who are left. One obvious answer—we have heard from some quarters—would be to release all the detainees at Guantanamo. I fear that that would not be entirely wise. It would hardly serve not only the US Government's own citizens but everyone else in the world if the Americans were suddenly to release people who could return to terrorism, as some of those already released have.

My hon. Friend's question raises a number of detailed issues that I am happy to try to address this evening. First, on the legal aspects of indefinite detention, it is useful to understand the US Government's legal position, even if one does not necessarily agree with it. The US Government believe that they are in a continuing state of at least potentially worldwide armed conflict with al-Qaeda—that is, at war. They believe therefore that the laws of armed conflict apply to those whom they detain. The US Government's view is that under the laws of armed conflict, they are entitled to detain people until that war is over, as they did, for example, during world war two, when again no one knew how long the conflict would last.

The British Government's view is that, whatever the status of the so-called global war on terror, the detainees at Guantanamo are entitled to humane treatment and, if prosecuted, to a fair trial. We have made that clear to the United States authorities. The United States is well aware of the UK's opposition to the death penalty under all circumstances. In private diplomatic discussions, at both ministerial and official levels, the UK has made its views known to the US Government and has made representations to them about the circumstances in which, and conditions under which, detainees are held at Guantanamo.

After a lengthy series of discussions with the US, which were led for the Government by the Attorney-General, in 2004 the Government concluded that the military commissions process would not provide sufficient guarantees of a fair trial according to international standards. That eventually led to the release and return of the British detainees at Guantanamo. I am sure that hon. Members will be aware that most of the military commission's proceedings have been stayed, pending a US Supreme Court decision in June on the right of the detainees to challenge the legality of their detention.

My hon. Friend raised the question of torture and other allegations of abuse at Guantanamo. Let me make our position on torture absolutely clear. The United Kingdom condemns unreservedly the use of torture and works hard with its international partners to eradicate that abhorrent practice. We abide by our commitments under international law, including the UN convention against torture and the European convention on human rights, and we expect all other countries to comply with their international obligations. We are active in pressing them to deliver on those human rights commitments.

The US Government have given repeated assurances on this matter and on the treatment of detainees. Those assurances include the detailed public statement made by the US Secretary of State, Dr. Condoleezza Rice, on 5 December 2005, which confirmed that the US respects the rules of international law, including the UN convention on torture. Dr. Rice stated that the US does not authorise or condone the torture of detainees, and that torture and conspiracy to commit torture are crimes under US law wherever they may occur in the world. In addition, the US Detainee Treatment Act, which was enacted on 30 December 2005, provides that no individual in the custody or under the physical control of the US Government, regardless of nationality, shall be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. That legislation makes a matter of statute what President Bush has made clear was already US Government policy.

My hon. Friend has reminded the House of a report submitted on 15 February by five holders of mandates of special procedures of the UN Commission on Human Rights. A number of serious criticisms about the reported situation of detainees in Guantanamo Bay were made in that report. In their formal reply on 10 March, the US Government strongly objected to the report both in terms of process and of substance, and argued that factual and legal assertions in it were inaccurate and flawed. It is clearly important that the US Government and the UN continue to engage on those issues.

My hon. Friend listed some of the techniques allegedly used at Guantanamo. Those allegations have surfaced previously in relation to UK nationals. I want to make it clear that, we take allegations of abuse and mistreatment made by UK nationals previously held at Guantanamo very seriously. In respect of the British detainees, we raised concerns about issues including isolation, lack of access to daylight, lack of exercise and delays with mail. We pursued those concerns with the US authorities and secured a number of improvements in the physical conditions of the detention of the detainees, as well as improvements to the exercise regime and mail service.

The nine visits made by Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials to check on the British detainees' welfare showed us that, overall, the detainees appeared in sound physical health. The families of the detainees were given read-outs of the visits and statements were made to Parliament. Our visits found that medical facilities at Guantanamo were of a high standard. On each of the nine visits, we gave the British detainees the opportunity to express concerns about their treatment. None of them alleged to us that they were systematically mistreated at Guantanamo.

Over the past few months, several right hon. and hon. Members have raised the circumstances of the former UK residents who are detained in Guantanamo. It is the longstanding policy of the UK Government not to offer consular assistance to non-British nationals, except in cases in which a specific agreement to do so exists with another state. My hon. Friend spoke of exceptions to that rule, such as the case of Abdul Rahman, the Christian convert in Afghanistan who faced the threat—it was a remote possibility—of the death penalty.

Hon. Members will no doubt be aware of the recent judicial review of the former Foreign Secretary's decision not to make formal representations to the United States Government for the release and return to the UK of three of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay who were formerly resident in the UK. The court held that there was no duty on the Foreign Secretary in domestic or international law to make the formal request sought by the claimants. The claimants have been granted leave to appeal, so it would not be appropriate for me to say any more about the case at the moment.

The court also recognised that the Government have made informal representations on humanitarian grounds to the US Government in respect of the detainee claimants. In 2005, my predecessor, Baroness Symons, agreed exceptionally to meet the families and representatives of those detainees who we knew were formerly resident in the UK, but were not British nationals, on a humanitarian basis. We passed on the concerns expressed to us by the families to the US authorities.

I fully agree with my hon. Friend that there needs to be greater understanding of how Guantanamo operates. A visit by, say, the Foreign Affairs Committee would clearly help to achieve that. I understand that the Committee is already in touch with the US Administration about visiting the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay.

As I have said, it is important that we never forget the context in which Guantanamo came about: the slaughter of 3,000 innocent people on 11 September. That was followed by atrocities in Madrid, Bali, Sharm el Sheikh, Amman, Istanbul, Riyadh and Moscow, and then last summer by the attacks on the London underground. The intent is clear. In Iraq and Afghanistan, the terrorists want to destroy new-found freedom and democracy and to kill people. I was in Baghdad when al-Zarqawi's suicide bombers murdered hundreds of innocent Shi'a Iraqis in just a couple of bloody days. Understandably, I suppose, the fate of those poor people has not been the subject of intense legal and human rights scrutiny in the way in which the detaining of terrorist suspects at Guantanamo has. We do not expect civilised behaviour from al-Qaeda henchmen, but we should not forget that those people had human rights, too. It is right that Britain should stand firm with our friends and allies against such evil.

All of us who care for the cause of civil liberties and human rights should pause and recall that those who were so brutally murdered in London on 7 July and in many other atrocities had human rights. Self-appointed executioners took those rights away from them, so we will continue to pursue those who commit acts of terrorism. At the same time, we shall maintain absolutely our commitment to civil liberties and human rights.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Howells: No, I will not.

It will not surprise my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East that it is not in my gift, nor, indeed, in the UK Government's, to close Guantanamo Bay. Our position is clear and consistent: it would be better if Guantanamo were closed. We will do what we can to bring that about, but hon. Members should recognise that that is not an easy task and that balancing security and liberty never has been easy.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Iran

1. Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): What her most recent assessment is of the threat posed to regional security by Iran's nuclear programme. [72677]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Margaret Beckett) rose—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Margaret Beckett: Thank you. Iran is undermining the authority of the International Atomic Energy Agency through its failure to take the confidence-building measures repeatedly requested of it by the IAEA. In the process, Iran is undermining the credibility of the non-proliferation regime, which remains a cornerstone of international peace and security. Iran's insistence on this approach is raising regional and international tensions and risks destabilising the region.

Mr. Austin: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and congratulate her on her new position. Does she agree that President Ahmadinejad's apparent determination to develop nuclear weapons is made all the more worrying by his sponsorship of terrorist organisations such as Hezbollah, his denial of the holocaust, his threat to wipe Israel off the map, and the middle eastern arms race that would result from such development? What is the UK doing to build international support to ensure that this course of action does not take place?

Margaret Beckett: I share the view of my hon. Friend that all the things that he has identified heighten concern about the stance of the Iranian regime. He asks me what the UK is doing. We are part of the EU3, which has been discussing these issues. We are now discussing them with the United States, Russia and China in an attempt to accelerate realisation within Iran that the international community as a whole is united in wishing Iran to return to compliance with what is urged on it by the IAEA. We have been engaged in substantial talks on that—particularly my predecessor, to whom I pay tribute in this respect—and we will continue to be so until, as we hope, success is achieved.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): Will the right hon. Lady accept my good wishes? Is she already learning that diplomats are people who can be disarming, especially when their countries are not? With regard to Iran, will she share with her American colleague the view that while the Americans are right to say that no option, including the military option, can at this stage be taken off the table, they ought also to be more generous in offering to Iran the kind of normalisation that they have felt able to achieve with Libya, in exchange for a full renunciation of nuclear weapons and a uranium enrichment programme?

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his good wishes, and also for his advice. Although I may not have been engaged in negotiations in the Foreign Office in the past, I have a certain amount of experience of negotiations at large—

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Not least in the Labour party.

Margaret Beckett: Particularly, perhaps, in the Labour party.

Although I take the point that the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) makes, as part of the discussions to which I have just referred we should try to put together a balanced approach that clearly indicates the danger of sanctions against Iran unless it is prepared to come back into compliance with the will of the international community, but there is also a great deal of discussion about whether it is possible to offer a substantial package of incentives. That balance is important to give Iran a clear choice which it can sensibly, reasonably and viably make.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) in welcoming my right hon. Friend to her new post. She will be aware that there is considerable concern in the House not only about the potential for nuclear proliferation in Iran, but about some of the likely repercussions of a response to try to deter such proliferation. I am particularly concerned about what the impact might be not only on the middle east generally, but specifically on Iraq, and the need to keep the Shi'ite community on the side of the international parties involved there. Will she discount any military action in Iran unless it is explicitly called for by a United Nations resolution?

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his good wishes. Everyone must recognise the dangers to the region as a whole of problems in Iran and Iraq. It is clearly not the intention of the international community to take military action, but it is the intention of the international community to encourage Iran to see the nature of the choice that lies before it and to take the choice that is in the interests of the Iranian people.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I, too, welcome the Foreign Secretary to her new position and join her in congratulating her predecessor on his role in the EU3. Does she agree that it is odd that in this dispute the two countries most closely concerned, the United States of America and Iran, are not speaking directly to each other? Does she agree with the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who has suggested that it is possibly time for negotiations between Iran and the United States? Is she prepared to act as a broker in any such negotiations?

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his good wishes and thank him for suggesting that I should put myself right in the middle of difficult and delicate international negotiations. It is clearly for Iran and the United States to decide what dialogue and negotiation should take place between them, and although it is perfectly reasonable for an American politician to comment on that matter, it would not be wise for me to do so.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on her appointment and ask her whether she considers that Iran has broken the non-proliferation treaty, and if so, in what way. Is she conducting any direct discussions or negotiations with Iran, which is, after all, the only country in the region that is still a signatory to the NPT; and does she think that the NPT is an important treaty and document?

Margaret Beckett: We take the view that Iran has contravened some of its obligations, but whether or not we take that view matters much less than the fact that the IAEA board has clearly stated that it shares our concern, as has the international community at large. The breach concerns the apparent concealment by Iran of some of its activities. I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks, but my concern is to encourage Iran to see the nature of the choice that lies before it and to make a choice that will contribute to peace and security in Iran and, indeed, provide Iran with civil nuclear power, if that is what it wants, while also contributing to peace and security in the wider world.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): I join in the welcome to the Foreign Secretary and congratulate her on her first diplomatic triumph in persuading the Prime Minister that the idea of splitting responsibility for the Foreign Office and creating a Secretary of State for Europe was truly bizarre—the idea had to be abandoned on the day of the reshuffle within about two hours of being embarked upon. After that diplomatic triumph, will she indicate when a formal offer will be made by the EU3 to Iran, and can she tell the House any more about the nature of that offer? Given that the Iranian Government have described the suspension of uranium enrichment as "not on the agenda", if they maintain that position after the receipt of the EU3 offer, will she be prepared to give vocal support to meaningful sanctions against Iran as part of her balanced approach, including a ban on the sale of all military, nuclear and dual-use technology?

Margaret Beckett: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his good wishes. Just as the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) gave me good advice about diplomats, he should not believe everything that he reads in the media about the nature of negotiations within the Government. I cannot say much more to him at the moment about the nature of the offer that might be made. Work is continuing and, as I am sure that he will appreciate, the greater the anxiety to make a substantial and worthwhile offer, the more important it is that detailed and careful work is carried out.

I cannot say much more about the nature of the offer or whether it is likely to come in the next few days, but I assure the right hon. Gentleman that thorough work is continuing. Given that what Iran has indicated will be unacceptable, it is clear that Iran is likely to face a stark choice. We all hope that it will not be necessary to move towards sanctions, but if it is necessary to do so, the sanctions will be those that people feel are capable of having an effect. At this point, I no more want to discuss the exact nature of those sanctions than I want to say much more about any formal offer.

Iraq

2. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What discussions she has had with representatives of the Iraqi Government on that Government's new structure. [72678]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Margaret Beckett): Earlier today, I spoke to the Iraqi Foreign Minister, Dr. Hoshyar Zebari to congratulate him on his reappointment. I will continue the regular and close dialogue with Iraqi leaders established by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Paddy Tipping: I warmly welcome the Foreign Secretary to her new post. I welcome, too, the formation of the first broadly based elected Government in Iraq. It has been a long process. Will she commit to stay with the task, however difficult, until democratic renewal is finally achieved?

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I share his view that it is extremely important that we welcome the formation of a Government of national unity in Iraq and commit ourselves to work with them. Although the conventional wisdom is that it has been a long process—I understand that people would have liked it to be shorter—I would point out that there was initially the period of election verification, and then the period of coalition building. Considering that the Iraqis have no experience of this kind of democracy at all, compared with what has happened in other nation states with rather more experience, we should perhaps be congratulating them on their speed.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I welcome the Foreign Secretary to her post. Is the four-year timetable for the withdrawal of the significant presence of UK troops from Iraq an official position; how exactly did it emerge yesterday; and, if it is not the official position, what is the timetable for withdrawal?

Margaret Beckett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his good wishes. What has been said very clearly about the potential for withdrawal is that it is hoped to move towards Iraqi control of particular cities and provinces. A process of assessment is now under way, and we expect the report from that quite soon. It would be what I might call a conditional process, in the sense that it would depend on what the conditions were assessed as being in those cities and provinces and whether the Iraqis were able to take control of the security situation there, which would be a precursor to troops being withdrawn. As he will appreciate, it is potentially a step-by-step process. I am not going to attempt to put a timetable on it. The process has not yet begun. We hope that it will be able to begin soon, because that will demonstrate how Iraq is moving to a more peaceful position.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): I join the many others who have congratulated the Foreign Secretary on her new position and wish her every success in her new role. A quick glance at today's Order Paper shows that she has quite a bit to be getting on with.

Yesterday, the new Iraqi Prime Minister said very clearly, in public:

"There is an agreement for the transfer of security under a timetable which starts in June."

He indicated that by the end of this year most provinces will be under Iraqi control. Is there an agreed timetable, or are there even agreed criteria, for the transfer of security responsibilities? When will we get a chance to have a detailed strategy for Iraq from the Government which we can debate in this House?

Margaret Beckett: The remarks made yesterday by the Iraqi Prime Minister about June refer to the process of assessment that I mentioned a moment ago. We expect the report of the assessment committee in June, and it is certainly hoped that that will allow us to begin to transfer some provinces and cities. The hon. Gentleman will know, I hope, that our own Prime Minister has pointed out that it is an objective timetable. It is hoped that it will be a step-by-step process, but it will depend on the position in those cities and provinces. Of course, people can express all kinds of hopes for the speed with which the process will continue, but it will be, I hope, a measured speed based on conditions on the ground, not on some artificial timetable.

EU Constitution

1. Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): What the Government's policy is on pursuing ratification of the EU constitution. [58579]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Government have made it clear that the constitutional treaty will be ratified in the UK only after a referendum. However, following the rejection of the treaty in the Dutch and French referendums, the European Council agreed on a period of reflection to consider the way forward. The European Council will come back to the matter this June. We will participate constructively in these discussions.

Mr. Gauke: First, I wish the Minister for Europe well in his post. I do not know whether congratulations are in order, but I certainly wish him well.

Given that, in recent weeks, the German Chancellor, the Italian Prime Minister and the President of the European Commission have said that there may yet be life in the European constitution, does not the right hon. Gentleman believe that it is time to make it clear that the British Government oppose trying to resuscitate it and that we will not support its integrationist policies and objectives, such as giving more powers to European institutions over criminal justice?

Mr. Hoon: The Government have made it clear that they will participate effectively in any discussions on the future of the treaty. As I have seen in my first 10 days back in the job, there is a range of views throughout the European Union about the best way forward. It is sensible to consider them and to discuss with our partners an appropriate way forward. We should not make early decisions—we are not doing that, and it is right and proper, in the best interests of this country, to remain fully engaged in those conversations with our European partners.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend back to the Foreign Office as Minister for Europe. He obviously did the job so well last time that the Prime Minister had to have him back. As he knows, last week, the EU published a report, which showed that Bulgaria and Romania were generally on track to join the EU in January next year. Given that the EU's rules and regulations were designed for the EU at 15 and that the constitution was designed to update its efficiency, does he agree that it is important that those elements of the constitution that can be taken forward with our colleagues and will result in a more efficient and effective EU should be effected before other steps are taken to ratify it?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's good wishes. I am delighted that I made such an impact in the two short months when I did the job previously. He is characteristically modest in refraining from adding that he succeeded me in the position and that whatever work I was able to do was clearly overshadowed by his contribution.

My hon. Friend is right that the process of enlargement has necessarily led in the past to institutional change. It is perhaps stating the obvious that, as the EU has grown, it has been necessary to adjust the way in which decisions are made to reflect the new reality. However, as I said earlier, it is important at this stage to continue to hold conversations with our European partners so that we are not isolated and to ensure that the voice of Britain is heard at those discussions. That is the position that the Government will take.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): With several member states working towards reviving the EU constitution at next month's summit, it appears increasingly likely that the British Government, owing to their failure to show leadership, may, for a second time, be pushed into accepting a constitution that they do not want. Does the Minister agree that it would save everyone a great deal of confusion and wasted effort if he said emphatically today that Britain will not accept the EU constitution or any of the increased powers in it? If the Government are again swept along by those who want an integrated Europe, will he guarantee that this country has a referendum before any further transfer of powers to the EU?

Mr. Hoon: I have made the position on the European treaty absolutely clear. I repeat that the Government have said that the constitutional treaty will be ratified in the United Kingdom only after a referendum.

On leadership and isolation, the hon. Gentleman may like to know that, in the course of my various conversations in the past 10 days, I have met a range of leaders from the Christian Democrats—hitherto allies of the Conservative party—and, if any political party is isolated in Europe today, it is the Conservative party. I have received several complaints from Christian Democrats who clearly believe that I have some influence with the Conservative party—I had to tell them that I did not. The Conservative party is leaderless on Europe and has drifted well to the right.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): May I tell the Secretary of State—[Interruption.] I mean the Minister for Europe, recycled. May I tell him that I am so pro-European that if he cut me in half, he would find yellow stars running through me, as in a stick of rock? However, those of us who are pro-European do not have a stomach for the constitution. We much prefer the gradualist approach, which has been the EU's strength in its development. It would be much more prudent if the UK pursued that policy rather than a grand constitution, which confused people and caused unnecessary alarm. We should stick to the gradualist approach, which has been a success for the past 30 years.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has added to the debate on this question, and I will endeavour to do my best to represent his views when we have further conversations with our European partners. The whole House will recognise that there is a range of opinions on this matter in the European Union—and in the House—and it is necessary for the United Kingdom Government to engage in those conversations. The problem with those on the Conservative Front Bench is that they simply stand on one side, saying that everyone is isolated except the Conservative party, and not participating in any way to defend Britain's best interests.

Palestinian Authority

4. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): If she will make a statement on financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority. [72680]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Margaret Beckett): We remain committed to supporting the Palestinian people. On 25 April, we gave £15 million to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. We strongly support the Quartet and the General Affairs and External Relations Council's proposal to establish a mechanism to provide assistance to the Palestinian people. However, until the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority commits to the three Quartet principles, which it has so far failed to do, direct budgetary assistance to the PA will remain suspended.

Mr. Hollobone: Is it not the case that corrupt officialdom in the Palestinian Authority, together with Hamas's refusal to recognise the right of Israel to exist, are impoverishing the Palestinian people and stoking the flames of Palestinian civil war?

Margaret Beckett: I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman is wrong in his final remark. I certainly agree, however, that the factors that he mentioned do nothing to improve either the security situation or the prospects for the Palestinian people. Our prime concern is that we should be able to mitigate the sufferings and difficulties of those people as much as we can, and that will continue to be our goal. We will also continue to urge Hamas to recognise how much better it would be for the people it has been elected to lead if it recognised the needs of the international community.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): In welcoming my right hon. Friend to her very well merited appointment, and commending the fine work of her predecessor, may I ask her to bear in mind that the withholding of aid and revenues from the Palestinians by the international community, the withholding of revenues that rightly belong to the Palestinians by the Israeli Government, the illegal expansion of illegal settlements announced during the past few days by the Israeli Government, the continued expansion of the illegal wall—

Hon. Members: Too long!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has certainly made his point. I call the Foreign Secretary.

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his remarks and his support. I accept the basic point that he is making about the real risks involved in the deteriorating situation with regard to the flow of revenues. However, people are working now on establishing a temporary mechanism, and we very much hope that, by that means, we shall be able to alleviate some of the difficulties that the Palestinian people in particular will face. We will continue to work on that, as well as urging all parties to return to the road map and to a negotiated path to peace.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): The Quartet has rightly suspended budgetary aid and endorsed a temporary international mechanism to deliver assistance to the Palestinian people. Will the Foreign Secretary tell us what proposals the United Kingdom has put forward for that mechanism, and when it will be launched? Does she accept, on the basis of what I saw for myself last week in the occupied territories, that the Palestinian economy is now contracting very sharply indeed? Provided that such a mechanism cannot be abused, it needs to be established with all possible speed if serious humanitarian problems are to be avoided.

Margaret Beckett: I entirely take the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes. As much speed as can be achieved is of the essence. I cannot say much more to him about the detail, because there is still a lot of discussion to take place, but it appears likely that the first priority will be assistance with health care. There is a clear recognition, however, of the potential and actual damage being done both to the economy of Palestine and the ability of the Palestinian people to support themselves. I assure him that the urgency that he urges on us is very much present in our minds.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on being the first woman to hold that post in this country. How does she believe that the provision of basic health and education services to the Palestinian people can be maintained if the salaries of those working in those services cannot be paid, as they are ultimately employed by the Palestinian Authority?

Margaret Beckett: I thank my hon. Friend for her kind remarks. Everyone is conscious both of the need for health and education services to be maintained and of the difficulties caused if funding is not available to pay salaries. Consideration is being given to the best ways in which we can offer practical help, as the course that she urges on us raises some genuine practical difficulties. I assure her, however, that we are considering what we can best achieve in the fastest way possible.

Zimbabwe

5. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What recent action the Government have taken to influence world opinion on the situation in Zimbabwe. [72681]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): During the past six months, the Government have worked with our EU partners to maintain travel, financial and military sanctions on the Mugabe regime; ensured that the International Monetary Fund keeps Zimbabwe suspended; kept Zimbabwe under scrutiny by the Security Council; worked with the UN Secretary-General to address Zimbabwe's governance problems; and, with the US and leading allies, maintained international pressure for change. We will sustain that pressure.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does the Minister agree with the United Nations, which reflects world opinion, that Zimbabwe is in meltdown? With 700,000 people losing their jobs and homes as a result of Mr. Mugabe's clearance policies, inflation at more than 500 per cent., unemployment at 80 per cent., and 70 per cent. of the population having only one meal or less per day, do the Government have a new agenda to use world opinion to remove from brutality and deprivation the good people of Zimbabwe?

Mr. Hoon: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the appalling state of affairs in Zimbabwe. That is entirely the responsibility of the Mugabe regime. I set out to the House the range of measures over which the Government have influence in informing world opinion, both through the EU and the UN, to keep the pressure on that regime. Change can come only from inside Zimbabwe, and we want to see that change in the interests of the people of that country.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Have Her Majesty's Government made any protest to the European Commission about the fact that the Humanitarian Aid and Development Commissioner met the Zimbabwean Finance Minister in Brussels recently? He was given a visa—perhaps, technically, he was allowed to have one—but surely his meeting with the commissioner goes against the whole spirit of the European Union sanctions. It sends out the message that if the European Union will meet Zimbabwe, why should the African Union not do so?

Mr. Hoon: I know that my hon. Friend has taken a long and sustained interest in the situation in Zimbabwe, and I know from her observations in the House of her personal commitment to trying to resolve the appalling situation faced by the people of Zimbabwe. That is really the issue. Clearly, we want to see sustained pressure on the regime and further international action to isolate Mugabe's leadership. At the same time, we have no quarrel whatever with the people of Zimbabwe, and we need to continue to find effective ways to allow food aid in particular to reach them. Above all, the tragedy of Zimbabwe is that it was the country that fed many other countries of southern Africa over a long period, and it is now incapable of feeding itself. We need to ensure that we do not take action that further damages the interests of the people of that country.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): On relinquishing her previous post, the Foreign Secretary left behind a trail of failure, disaster and unpaid farmers in my constituency. What—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is out of order.

Afghanistan

6. Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): What recent assessment she has made of progress with reconstruction in Afghanistan. [72682]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Afghanistan has made rapid progress over the past four years. It has established a new constitution and a democratically elected president and parliament. The Afghan Government are committed to economic and social reconstruction. Economic growth is good and is forecast to be 14 per cent for 2005-06. There are now 60 per cent. more functioning health clinics, nearly 2,000 schools have been built or rehabilitated, and 60,000 former combatants have been disarmed since 2001.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that efforts to improve security in Afghanistan are an essential part of the reconstruction process. What is being done to ensure that the Foreign Office, the Ministry of Defence and the Department for International Development work together, so that the progress of which he speaks not only continues but thrives?

Dr. Howells: I can reassure my hon. Friend that the United Kingdom is committed to supporting the United Nations-authorised and NATO-led international security assistance force mission in Afghanistan. Stage 3 of ISAF expansion involves helping it to achieve its goal and enabling the Afghan Government to extend their authority across the entire country.

I have seen for myself many DFID projects throughout Afghanistan that are achieving great things for the people there. Most important, 37 per cent. of children being educated in Afghanistan are girls. That would not have been allowed under the despotic Taliban regime, and it will make the greatest change to Afghanistan. I am very proud to welcome that development.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The Minister will know that one of our key tasks in Afghanistan is to provide alternative livelihoods for poppy farmers. DFID has said that the success of alternative livelihood programmes will depend on the security situation. The former Secretary of State for Defence said that the success of our security operations would depend on the success of the alternative livelihood programmes. Which of those comes first?

Dr. Howells: It is not a chicken-and-egg situation, although it may sound like one. The fact is that we cannot afford to pay every farmer to produce crops other than the opium poppy. It is impossible: the costs would be astronomical. What we must do, therefore, is help to build a new infrastructure in Afghanistan, and provide people with skills enabling them to do the jobs that are required for the economy to be made viable.

We are trying to do that, although there are people in Afghanistan—the Taliban, the drugs mafia and others—who do not want it to happen. They thrive on anarchy. They thrive in a country where there is no law and order, and where people can be killed very cheaply and easily. We and our military must work on that, and the 35 other countries in Afghanistan, along with the United Nations, must help to bring law and order to the country. That is precisely what we are doing now.

The short answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that we must do both those things at the same time. It is not easy, but I am confident that we can do it.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that a newly elected woman Member of Parliament, Malalai Joya, was recently attacked in the Parliament and is so threatened that she has to move to a safe house every night; that Salima Sharif and Raazia Balloch, who are councillors in Helmand, have both received death threats; and that Fauzia Ulomi, the head of the women's affairs department in that province, narrowly escaped assassination? Bearing in mind the Government's commitment to United Nations Security Council resolution 1325 on women, peace and security, will my hon. Friend undertake to discuss with the Afghan Government how they can further advance women's equality, and how they can do more to protect the status and security of their elected women representatives?

Dr. Howells: My hon. Friend has reinforced what I said a moment ago. We must ensure that we give whatever help we can to improve the general security position in Afghanistan—and certainly we must protect those brave women who, after many years of authoritarian, cruel Taliban rule, have put their heads above the parapet, stood for election and been elected. Indeed, President Karzai told me that he is very pleased with the number of women MPs who have been elected in Afghanistan, and that the proportion is higher than that in the British Parliament. That is something to be proud of.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am very pleased that the Minister has been able to give us some good news about capacity building in Afghanistan. However, he told me in written answers on 9 February 2006, at columns 1444-45W of the Official Report, that, according to the figures for 2004-05—the last year for which figures are available—some 4,100 tonnes of opium were produced in Afghanistan, of which a paltry 160 tonnes were seized. When does he expect the British Government's approach to assisting the national drugs control strategy in Afghanistan to have a better effect?

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman is right that that year's opium poppy harvest was huge and this year's will, I think, be at least as big. Between now and September, when the next planting season begins, we have got to try to convince people not to grow poppies, especially in Helmand, where, according to figures that I saw the other day, some 23 per cent. of Afghanistan's opium poppies are grown. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) asked how we can do that, and the answer is that we have to convince people that something else can be grown, and that there are other jobs that will allow them to earn money. An enormous amount of aid is going in to provide help in that regard. Some of those jobs will be paid jobs, such as road-building, providing coolers for agricultural produce and providing the means of getting such produce out of the area. It was not so very long ago that Afghanistan was one of the biggest exporters to the EU of dessert grapes. Of course, the Taliban, in their wisdom, decided that there was a link between grapes and alcohol and they grubbed the vineyards. What did the farmers do? They started to grow opium. That has not been attacked, of course, by the Taliban or by anybody else. They now find it convenient to work with the opium barons to ensure that anarchy persists in that country, but we will do all that we can to ensure that they do not succeed.

Muslim Democracies

7. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the likelihood of more democracies emerging in the next decade in countries that have wholly or predominantly Muslim populations. [72683]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Change is happening in many of those countries. Some will progress faster than others, but there is a demonstrable demand for greater democracy from the people of those countries, which should sustain the momentum for change. I welcome the conclusions of last December's summit of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference, which recognised the need for Governments to respond to that demand. Surveys such as those in the Arab human development report show a real desire for democracy, as Muslim countries from Mauritania to Indonesia feel the pressure to cope with huge demographic changes and significant increases in youth unemployment, combined with a revolution in worldwide communications that affects us all.

Mr. Prentice: The Library tells me that, according to an independent survey carried out this year of 46 countries with Muslim majority populations, 23 were not free, 20 were partly free and only three were free—up from one a decade ago. There is no inherent contradiction between, or conflict between, Islam and democracy, but why has progress been so painfully slow?

Dr. Howells: There are probably many reasons. Certainly, there is no lack of examples of Muslim countries that have become successful democracies. One thinks of Malaysia, Indonesia and Turkey, and we are seeing big moves toward democracy in Lebanon. We have witnessed, moreover, the first free presidential and parliamentary elections in Egypt, so things are moving. If my hon. Friend is saying that there is some inherent contradiction between a country's being Muslim and its ability to become a democracy, I would have to disagree with him.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Five of the 46 countries in question are in central Asia. What pressure is the Minister bringing to bear on EU partners to ensure that the visa ban and arms embargo on Uzbekistan, which will be essential in trying to foster democracy in that country, will be extended beyond October?

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman can be sure that we will look carefully into anything that will further human rights in countries such as Uzbekistan and advance the cause of democracy and capacity building so that democracies can emerge. We are not in the business of trying to help dictators of whatever colour to thrive in their own country and certainly not to spread their influence beyond their own frontiers.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): As one of the international observers to the Palestinian parliamentary elections in January, I know that, whatever else one might say about Hamas, nobody can say that the election was not democratic or that it was not democratically elected. If the international community is saying to that democratic Government that international acceptance is dependent on them abiding by their international obligations, particularly in respect of recognising their neighbours, is the international community prepared to say the same thing to the new democratically elected Government of Israel? We know that Israel's new Prime Minister is suggesting that he will establish borders for the country—in defiance of international law—along the route of the wall and illegal settlements.

Dr. Howells: The United Kingdom is the friend of both the Israeli and the Palestinian peoples and we have made it clear all along that we expect Israel to abide by the UN Security Council resolutions, in the same way that we expect the forces that have caused such chaos in Palestine to do. I have made it clear many times that I consider the building of the barrier by the Israelis so that it incorporates Palestinian territory to be wrong: it is illegal and it should not happen. It will do nothing to promote peace in the middle east and will generate only further terrorism among people in Palestine and elsewhere. I call on the Israelis to understand the significance of what they are doing in that respect. They certainly have a right to defend themselves, but they do not have the right to capture land that is not theirs.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): Does the Minister agree that one of the best ways of encouraging Muslim democracies is to encourage a modern, effective secular democracy in Turkey and that one of the best ways to achieve that is to argue for Turkish membership of the European Union?

Dr. Howells: That is exactly what we have been doing. During my visits to Turkey, I have been struck by the great efforts made to make Turkey a more democratic country. There are many reasons why we need that, and we need it urgently. A great deal of Afghanistan heroin moves through Turkey into the EU and western Europe. We need to be able to co-operate with Turkey with confidence in order to disrupt those supplies before they get into the veins of children in this country.

International Arms Trade Treaty

8. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): If she will make a statement on progress towards an international arms trade treaty. [72684]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Margaret Beckett): We are building support for a UN-based process towards an international arms trade treaty. In 2005, we secured broad support from both the EU and the Commonwealth. A further global lobbying exercise is now under way, involving all of our overseas posts. We are in contact with a wide range of partners to secure agreement for the start of a formal process at the UN General Assembly later this year.

Mr. Kidney: It is a pleasure to see my right hon. Friend in her new post and I am also pleased to hear that we are at the head of international efforts to secure control over the proliferation and misuse of conventional arms. Will she give some credit to non-governmental organisations such as Oxfam and Amnesty International for their persistence in pushing that agenda? Does she accept that a still broader coalition could be built between Governments, NGOs, trade unions and legitimate business interests to secure the treaty through the UN?

Margaret Beckett: I thank my hon. Friend and can tell him that I am very happy to give full credit to NGOs, including Amnesty, for the way in which they have consistently pushed the agenda, even at discouraging times. He is absolutely right that, if we to be successful in promoting such a treaty, we will need an even wider and deeper international consensus. We share his view about its components and we are helping to build it.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): I congratulate the right hon. Lady on her appointment. Will she kindly inform the House what discussions she has had about the arms treaty with the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry?

Margaret Beckett: Although I have had a substantial number of discussions since my appointment, I have not, as it happens, had discussions with the Ministry of Defence. However, it is my understanding that there is full support for that move and full recognition of the important contribution that it can make.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I, too, welcome my right hon. Friend to her new post. In terms of the arms trade, it is small weapons that are most often used to kill people, and the death toll is outrageous. The arms trade treaty is central to bearing down on that, but will she also try to develop the political will? For example, we know that states aspiring to join the EU are trading in small arms and helping to take the lives of millions of people.

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome and I accept his basic point about the dangers of small arms. He will know that some agreements—although they are not legally binding—are already under review, and we hope that we can strengthen them. When I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) that we wished to continue to work to build an international consensus, that of course includes our many partners, because we recognise the dangers to which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) alluded.

Muslim Brotherhood

9. Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): If she will make a statement on contact between her officials and members of the Muslim Brotherhood. [72685]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): British officials have varying degrees of contact in a range of countries with those regarded as Muslim Brotherhood. This is during the normal course of their work to encourage democratic and tolerant societies that embrace the rule of law and universal human rights principles. We will continue to promote this agenda and to challenge those views with which we disagree.

Michael Gove: I thank the Minister for his answer. He will be aware that Mr. Mockbul Ali, Islamic issues adviser at the Foreign Office, recently co-authored a presentation describing the Muslim Brotherhood as "reformist, liberal and progressive". Given that the Muslim Brotherhood and its spiritual leader, Sheikh Qaradawi, support suicide bombing, the persecution of homosexuals and the establishment of sharia law across the middle east, can the Minister tell me just what aspects of the brotherhood's agenda his officials have told him are reformist, liberal or progressive?

Dr. Howells: I certainly wish to emphasise that we do not seek to speak with those engaged in violence. Nor do we go out of our way to engage with non-violent organisations or individuals that support extremism and violence by others, but when we come across such cases, we press them to reject violence as a solution. We should be extremely careful not to paint all Islamists as violent, because they most certainly are not, and we are ready to engage with organisations and individuals who uphold the values of democracy and use peaceful means to achieve their objectives, challenging their views as necessary. Some of those have been elected, for example to the Egyptian Parliament, as independents, but are clearly associated with the Muslim Brotherhood. Our diplomats have met such people on occasion. We do not go out of our way to engage in such meetings, but when they occur, we argue the case for a non-violent approach. We argue against terrorism and we seek co-operation.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Is my hon. Friend aware that Mr. Mockbul Ali advised the Foreign Office that Sheikh Qaradawi should be admitted to this country, partly on the ground that to do otherwise would fuel Muslim views that there was a Jewish conspiracy throughout the world? Does my hon. Friend think that that is good advice and is Mr. Ali a good adviser?

Dr. Howells: We get all sorts of advice from civil servants and I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that sometimes we accept that advice and sometimes we do not.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): So that the Minister does not feel left out, I congratulate him on having survived the recent purge—I mean, reshuffle—because I am glad to see him in his usual place. Following the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) and the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), can the Minister tell the House whether the Foreign Office has any direct evidence that people in the Muslim Brotherhood to whom it has talked have been directly involved in the planning and execution of terrorist acts?

Dr. Howells: I certainly have no information on that, and I am not aware that anyone to whom we have spoken has been involved in such acts. The hon. Gentleman will recall, of course, that this Parliament has some history of engaging in secret talks with terrorist organisations, such as the IRA. Wherever possible, I shall endeavour to ensure that we do not engage with anyone who advocates terror, whether it be Islamist terrorism or some other sort, that threatens to kill innocent people.

St. Helena

10. Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): If she will visit St. Helena to discuss ways of improving relations with the UK. [72636]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Government value our relationship with St. Helena. We have demonstrated our commitment by agreeing to invest in the construction of an airport on the island. In addition, other UK financial assistance for St. Helena will amount to more than £14 million this financial year.

Foreign engagements for my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and other Ministers are kept under constant review. It is not our practice to announce such visits until they are firmly established in the diary. Because of the unpredictable nature of world events, final decisions on overseas visits are often not possible until very shortly before the day of travel.

Mr. Steen: One way for the Government to improve their relations with St. Helena would be for a Foreign Office Minister to go there. None ever has, although I know that the journey takes 10 days. The Minister referred to the airport that is to be built, but the island's 3,800 inhabitants are concerned about the health implications. They are worried that the large numbers of foreign workers needed to build the airport could bring with them diseases that are alien to the island, such as HIV/AIDS. What can the Minister do to help in that regard?

Mr. Hoon: I am genuinely sorry that it has not been possible for Foreign Office Ministers to visit St. Helena, either in recent times or at all, although I know that my Front-Bench colleagues share an ambition to do so. I recognise the substantial concern that the hon. Gentleman identifies, and I assure him that the Government are taking very seriously the need to find appropriate ways to screen workers arriving on the island.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I welcome the Government's commitment to helping the people of St. Helena by building the airport. That runway will bring new lifeblood to the island, as the lack of employment has caused many people to leave. I hope that my right hon. Friend will make a visit—perhaps he will take with him my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary—and that he will also call in at the Falklands and Gibraltar, to ensure that the people there get the proper representation that they deserve.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that the airstrip is not planned to be finished until 2010. Given what I said about Ministers' engagement diaries, I cannot commit my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to such a visit. However, the new airport is clearly important to the islanders, and the Government are delighted to be able to make the money available. I have visited Ascension island several times and had the opportunity then to meet a number of people from St. Helena. My hon. Friend is right that many islanders have had to leave to find employment, but we believe that the airstrip will change that and offer valuable economic opportunities, not least in respect of tourism, as it becomes easier for people to visit the island.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): When the Minister met those St. Helenians on Ascension island—which is a British dependent territory and an American base—did they communicate to him their enormous sense of betrayal? Five years ago, they were assured by the Governor of St. Helena and the British Government that they would have permanent residency rights. However, those rights have now been withdrawn, much as they were on Diego Garcia a generation ago.

Mr. Hoon: In fact, that issue did arise. It is something that we have taken very seriously.

Kashmir

11. Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): What recent discussions she has had with the Governments of India and Pakistan on the line of control in Kashmir. [72687]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Before I answer the question, I should like to take this opportunity to condemn yesterday's ambush by terrorists of a bus carrying Indian tourists in Indian-administered Kashmir. I understand that the bus driver was killed, and that further casualties may be announced. That is just the latest in a succession of atrocities, including the murder by terrorists of people participating in a rally in Srinagar last Sunday. Such crimes are designed to derail the peace process, but I understand that, as of today, talks are still making incremental progress.

Margaret Moran: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and join him in condemning the bombing reported today. We all welcomed the relaxation of movement over the line of control during the earthquake period, which brought division and terrible tragedy to families. Does my hon. Friend agree that the time is right for us to encourage both countries to relax the line of control further, to enable the movement of families between the countries and particularly to invite in human rights organisations to ensure that atrocities of the sort that we see daily are at least monitored, if not prevented?

Dr. Howells: The kinds of answer suggested by my hon. Friend to this intractable problem are interesting. Ultimately, they have to be agreed and decided on by the two parties—India and Pakistan. I was glad to see a relaxation of the line of control during the earthquake. It helped rescue and rebuilding, especially in Pakistan-controlled Kashmir. It is good to see the Pakistan Government closing down some of the terrorist camps and support bases for terrorists in Indian-controlled Kashmir and I very much hope that will continue. I know that all sides will look carefully at the types of suggestion made by my hon. Friend, and I shall be interested in their responses.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have received five replies to questions to the Home Office dated from 15 May back to 18 April, all of which promise a proper reply either shortly or as soon as possible, yet I have received none. Nor have I received replies to questions I tabled on 29 March and 14 March. Can you advise me, Mr. Speaker, of the further steps I can take to persuade Ministers to reply to parliamentary questions?

Mr. Speaker: Even five replies is good going—the hon. Gentleman is doing well. He should persevere and keep at the Ministers concerned; he should get on the phone and ask them why his questions have not been answered.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As soon as the Deputy Prime Minister was appointed to his new responsibilities, I tabled a written question asking him what criteria he would be applying for future visits to Dorneywood, which I would have thought would not require a great deal of research. Several days ago I received a holding answer, so I put down another question asking when the right hon. Gentleman would answer, but I have had no reply to that either. Do you think that perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister is overtaxed by his new responsibilities, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I will not get drawn into those arguments.

Corruption

3.32 pm

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about corruption.

I begin by declaring my interests, both as chair of the Africa all-party parliamentary group, which received funding from KPMG and Deloitte to print and publish its recent report on corruption in Africa, and for the advice and assistance with preparing the Bill that I received from Transparency International (UK).

In 1998 I sought to introduce a Bill to criminalise transnational bribery. It was opposed by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), who argued that it could put British business at a disadvantage in some international markets. I see that the hon. Gentleman is in the Chamber; I have discussed this Bill with him and I am grateful for his support for it. Much has changed since 1998.

Both the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the United Nations have adopted international conventions against bribery and corruption, and the limited purpose of my 1998 Bill was eventually enacted as a Government measure in 2001. There is no longer a risk of putting British companies at a disadvantage compared with their competitors, because all OECD countries, and all UN states, are now expected to legislate against corruption to similar standards.

Arguably, the United Kingdom has fallen behind, because it appears to be applying the conventions less rigorously than some other states. The OECD review of the UK's compliance with the OECD convention noted that the United States and France, for example, had prosecuted companies registered in their countries for transnational bribery offences while the UK had not, although I know that some UK cases are under investigation.

As a member of the International Development Committee, I have seen at first hand the devastating consequences of international and domestic corruption for poor people in poor countries. Their already precarious incomes are reduced further when corrupt officials demand bribes for services that are supposed to be provided free of charge. Everybody loses out when a high official or a Minister pockets public money that should be used to buy medicine or education, or to build roads.

The Prime Minister's Commission for Africa reported that "systemic corruption can add as much as 25 per cent to the costs of government procurement", and that

"of the US$4 trillion spent worldwide on government public contracts each year, some $400 billion is lost to bribery."

That $400 billion is more than the total annual income of every person in Africa. It would build a lot of schools and roads, and is 140 times the amount spent by the Global Fund on treating AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria in Africa in the first five years of the fund's existence.

The impact of corruption goes far further than the money lost. It creates a blight on investment and private sector development, and it holds back economic growth. Corruption funds and facilitates organised crime and terrorism. The proceeds flow into money-laundering structures, and the UK is involved because of the importance of the City of London and some UK Crown dependencies and overseas territories as international financial centres. To their credit, the UK Government led the international donor community last year in doubling aid to Africa, but the UK needs to take a similar leadership role in tackling the supply side of international corruption.

The current law on corruption rests on a confusing mix of common law and statutes—principally the Prevention of Corruption Acts of 1889, 1906 and 1916. The Law Commission published proposals for reform in March 1998. The proposals were taken forward in a draft Bill published by the Government in 2003, and referred for scrutiny to an all-party Joint Committee. The Bill tried to define corrupt activity by using an artificially extended concept of agency, which was of byzantine complexity. The Joint Committee's report on the Bill was clear, unanimous and trenchant. It concluded that the Government's approach would not be understood by police, prosecutors, jurors or the public—including, especially, the business and public sector communities and their advisers, both here and abroad. The Committee suggested a more straightforward way to define corrupt activity. That was initially rejected by the Government in December 2003, but last December the Home Office reopened its proposals to consultation.

The all-party Africa group, and an all-party panel of Members campaigning against corruption, submitted evidence calling for a wholly new Bill to address contemporary problems and to replace the existing legislation, which is 100 years old. To take that idea forwards, Transparency International (UK), with funding from the York-based Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust, drafted a corruption Bill, which, with some minor amendments, I am introducing today.

The key objective of the Bill is to reform the law of bribery in a way that will be readily intelligible, responsive to contemporary problems and fully compliant with the OECD and UN conventions. That would improve the prospects for successful prosecutions and help the Government to develop a coherent anti-corruption strategy. A clear new law is in the national interest. By enacting the Bill, the UK will demonstrate its willingness to assume a leading role in fighting corruption worldwide. That will reinforce the leading role of the City of London as the marketplace for world trade, finance and investment, and strengthen the UK's role in the international campaigns against terrorism and organised crime.

The fight against corruption is not anti-business. Promoting high standards of business integrity will maintain confidence in the UK's equities and securities markets, and tough laws outlawing corrupt practices strengthen business and markets, because they remove unacceptable levels of risk and anti-competitive conduct. The Bill defines bribery by reference to the improper conduct that is intended to result from the bribe. It defines corruption in law in the way that most people think of corruption and bribery. It is much clearer than the 2003 draft Bill.

My Bill also includes several new features of anti-corruption law. There is an offence of bribery of foreign public officials that corresponds precisely with the requirements of the OECD and UN conventions. There is a new offence of foreign bid rigging in competitive tendering. That problem was identified by the Joint Committee and does not fall easily within normal definitions of bribery. There is a new offence designed to safeguard the integrity of sporting events by criminalising the fixing of a race or match. That activity is frequently rooted in betting and linked to organised crime. With London hosting the 2012 Olympics, the creation of such an offence would send out an important message.

The Bill includes two new duties to be enforced through criminal sanctions. One requires UK companies to take steps to ensure that subsidiary companies and other contractually related parties do not commit corruption offences. The other requires public servants to report offers of bribes, or reasonable suspicions of corrupt practices. The Bill would remove the pointless and embarrassing requirement for the consent of the Attorney-General for any prosecution for corruption. It would empower the Serious Fraud Office to prosecute corruption cases without having to show that fraud is involved.

The Bill is worthy of a leading G8 nation that has ratified the international anti-corruption conventions, including the UN convention now in force. It would destroy the myth that there is competitive advantage for UK companies and nationals in being free to bribe abroad—a behaviour that few businesses would contemplate in this country. It is a timely and necessary Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Hugh Bayley, Mr. John Denham, Mike Gapes, Malcolm Bruce, Mr. Chris Mullin, John Bercow, Ms Sally Keeble, Mr. Gary Streeter, Tony Baldry, James Duddridge, Norman Lamb and Mr. Tom Clarke.

Corruption

Hugh Bayley accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about corruption: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 October, and to be printed [Bill 185].

Education and Inspections Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Order of 15th March 2006 (Education and Inspections Bill (Programme)) be varied as follows–

1. Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Order shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken on each of the days as shown in the following Table and in the order so shown.

3. Each part of the proceedings shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in relation to it in the second column of the Table.

First Day

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
New Clauses and new Schedules relating to Part 2 except those relating to the closure of special schools, new Clauses and new Schedules relating to foundations, amendments to Clauses 7 to 31, amendments to Schedules 2 and 3, remaining Government new Clauses and new Schedules, new Clauses and new Schedules relating to allegations against teachers, new Clauses and new Schedules relating to school discipline or home-school contracts, amendments to Part 7, new Clauses and new Schedules relating to grouping by ability.	The moment of interruption or, if later, six hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the motion for this Order.

Second Day

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
Remaining new Clauses and new Schedules except those relating to school admissions or to the general duties of local education authorities in relation to the provision of education.	Two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill on the second day.
New Clauses and new Schedules relating to school admissions, amendments to Clauses 36 to 48, new Clauses and new Schedules relating to the general duties of local education authorities in relation to the provision of education, remaining proceedings on consideration.	Five hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill on the second day.

4. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the second day or, if later, six hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill on the second day.—[Jim Knight.]

3.43 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I do not intend to detain the House on the programme motion. We support the broad principles of the Bill because it will make it easier for parent groups and other non-profit organisations to establish new schools and the new trust school concept will enable schools to have greater independence in their day-to-day running. We also support the Bill because it will make it easier to close bad schools and will put the disciplinary powers of teachers on a statutory basis.

However, we want the Bill to be debated in full, not least because we are less than happy with several of its elements. We thought that the programme motion moved after Second Reading provided insufficient time in Committee. In the end, the Government had to add an extra eight hours of Committee time, with two extended evening sittings and an extra day's sitting. Even with that, several clauses were not debated because they were lost to the knife.

Given the amount of interest in the Bill, it is likely that some groups of amendments, such as those on false allegations against teachers and the new clauses on the teaching of reading and the welfare of vulnerable pupils, are unlikely to be reached. However, we are keen for the good elements of the Bill to pass swiftly on to the statute book, so we will not oppose the motion.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): May I begin by welcoming the Secretary of State, and congratulating him on his new role? A reshuffle in the middle of Committee stage is hardly a dream, but I am sure that he will dazzle us with his mastery of his brief. I look forward to debating with him in the months ahead.

In common with Conservative spokesmen, we are concerned that the programme motion provides inadequate time to debate our concerns. In particular, we are worried that we will not reach the new clauses on vulnerable pupils that we tabled in Committee; indeed, we did not have enough time to reach them then. We do not wish to waste the time of the House, so we will not oppose the programme motion. Nevertheless, we wish to place on the record our concern that inadequate time has been provided.

3.45 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I do not want to delay the business either, as this is an important Bill that we wish to scrutinise carefully. Like other contributors, I fear that there is not enough time under the timetabling motion. I am particularly disturbed that the National Union of Teachers is running a campaign to influence hon. Members, as I have received two or three standard letters asking us to use this opportunity to vote down all selection by aptitude or ability. Two very fine grammar schools serve my constituency. The majority of my constituents and I want to sustain them so that they can flourish, and I am not sure that there is adequate time under the programme motion to debate that crucial point and remain in order. I hope that the Government will join us in saying that fine grammar schools that are well supported by local communities have every right to life and should not be threatened. I am not sure why the NUT think that we can vote today or tomorrow to stop that practice, but it is important to tell people outside the House about its campaign to destroy fine grammar schools, and to put on the record our staunch support for those schools.

Orders of the Day

Education and Inspections Bill

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

[Relevant documents: The Eighteenth Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Session 2005-06, Legislative Scrutiny: Ninth Progress Report, HC 1098, and the letter from the Secretary of State for Education and Skills to the Chairman of the Committee, dated 22nd May 2006.]

New Clause 33

PROPOSALS UNDER SECTION 7 RELATING TO COMMUNITY OR COMMUNITY SPECIAL SCHOOLS

'(1) A local education authority may by virtue of subsection (5)(b)(ii) of section 7 publish proposals under that section for the establishment of a community or community special school—

(a) only if at a prescribed time prescribed conditions are met in relation to the authority, and

(b) except where further prescribed conditions are also met in relation to the authority at that time, only with the consent of the Secretary of State.

(2) The conditions prescribed for the purposes of subsection (1)(a) or (b) must include conditions relating to the standards achieved by the authority in performing the functions to which Chapter 4 of Part 8 (inspection and review of local authorities in England) applies.

(3) The other conditions that may be prescribed for those purposes are conditions relating to either or both of the following—

(a) the standards of performance achieved by any relevant school, and

(b) the extent of diversity among relevant schools.

(4) The matters to which the Secretary of State is to have regard in determining whether to give consent under subsection (1)(b) include standards of the kind mentioned in subsections (2) and (3)(a) and the extent of diversity among relevant schools.

(5) The power by virtue of subsection (2) or (3)(a) to prescribe standards includes power to prescribe them by reference to the opinion of the Chief Inspector or by reference to any rating awarded by the Chief Inspector following an inspection or review under any enactment.

(6) In this section—

"Chief Inspector" means Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Education, Children's Services and Skills;

"maintained school" does not include a maintained nursery school;

"relevant school", in relation to a local education authority, means a maintained school maintained by the authority or an Academy, city technology college or city college for the technology of the arts in the area of the authority.'. —[Alan Johnson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Alan Johnson): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 16—Ballot of parents on change of category from community school to foundation school—

'(1) A proposal for a prescribed alteration involving a change of category from community school to foundation school may be implemented only if the proposal has been approved by a ballot of parents of pupils attending the school to which the proposal relates.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations about ballots under subsection (1).'.

New clause 17—Ballot of parents before publication of proposals under section 7—

'(1) The local education authority may publish a proposal under section 7 only if the proposal has been approved by a ballot of parents of pupils attending schools which, in the opinion of the local education authority, may be affected by the proposal.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations about ballots under subsection (1).

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to a proposal under section 7(5)(b)(ii) for the establishment of a community or community special school.'.

New clause 18—Duty to establish new school where current provision is inadequate—

'Where—

(a) fewer than 15 per cent. of schools in the area of a local education authority are foundation, voluntary or foundation special schools, or an Academy, or

(b) more than 15 per cent. of schools in the area of a local authority are in Ofsted category 4, the local authority must publish a notice under section 7 inviting proposals for a new foundation, voluntary or foundation special school.'.

New clause 19—Duty to establish new school when supported in adequate numbers—

'(1) Where a local education authority in England receive representations from parents of 100 or more qualifying children demanding the establishment of a new foundation, voluntary or foundation special school, the authority must publish a notice under section 7.

(2) In this section "qualifying child", in relation to a local education authority, means any child in the authority's area who is of or under compulsory school age.'.

New clause 21—Establishment of community schools—

'Where the Secretary of State is asked to grant consent for the proposal of a new community school under section 7 or 9, he shall act with a view to encouraging all schools to become foundation, voluntary or foundation special schools, and to acquire a foundation.'.

New clause 22—Assistance for proposals for new schools—

'(1) A local education authority in England shall provide advice and assistance to parents of children in the area of the authority in connection with developing a proposal for the establishment of a new school under sections 7 and 9.

(2) In particular, the authority shall provide support, which shall include dedicated consultancy support, to parents to ensure that any proposals brought forward are viable.

(3) In exercising its functions under this section, the authority shall act with a view to ensuring the development of viable proposals by parents.

(4) An authority may not refuse to assist a parent solely on the grounds that the original proposal is underdeveloped, unworkable or in practical respects substandard.'.

[Mr. Speaker]

New clause 23—Parental ballot etc. on change of category from foundation school to community school—

'(1) If it appears to the Secretary of State that at least one-fifth of the parents of pupils attending a foundation (or foundation special) school are in favour of a change of the category of that school to community (or community special) school, the Secretary of State must designate such person or body as he considers appropriate ("the designated body") to act for the purposes of this section.

(2) The Secretary of State may, if he sees fit, designate the governing body of the school or the local education authority as the designated body.

(3) The designated body must initiate a proposal for the change of category referred to in subsection (1).

(4) The Secretary of State may by regulations make such provision as he considers expedient to amend, vary or supplement the provisions of this Part in relation to proposals under subsection (3).

(5) A proposal under subsection (3) may be implemented only if the proposal has been approved by a ballot of parents of pupils attending the school to which the proposal relates.

(6) The Secretary of State may make regulations about ballots under subsection (5).'.

New clause 25—Duties of the schools commissioner—

'(1) The Schools Commissioner shall establish and make publicly available a list of potential trustees whom he has approved as appropriate for the role in accordance with guidance from the Secretary of State.

(2) A local education authority shall not consider any proposals under sections 7, 9 or 10 or alterations under sections 17 or 20 made by organisations other than those approved and listed by the Schools Commissioner.

(3) School governing bodies shall not enter negotiations or foundation agreements with trustee partners who have not been approved by the Schools Commissioner.'.

New clause 35—Role of the schools commissioner—

'(1) The Schools Commissioner shall promote fair access, choice, and diversity for all maintained schools.

(2) The Schools Commissioner shall provide advice and assistance to governing bodies and local education authorities in respect of—

(a) setting up new foundation schools, and

(b) an alteration of a maintained school to the category of foundation school, particularly with regard to supporting schools and raising standards in disadvantaged or deprived areas.

(3) The Schools Commissioner shall have responsibility for strategic oversight and monitoring of the admissions process in local authority areas, with particular regard to fair access and equitable admission policies for children with special educational needs.

(4) The Schools Commissioner shall monitor the collaboration and co-operation among new foundation schools.

(5) The Schools Commissioner shall report annually to both Houses of Parliament and, in particular, to the Education and Skills Committee of the House of Commons on his responsibilities and on his annual report.'.

New clause 38—Secretary of State's consent for community and community special school proposals—

'The Secretary of State shall consent to the publication of proposals under subsection 7(5)(b)(ii) or subsection 9(1) as the case may be unless he is satisfied that the proposal so to be published would not result in the improvement of the quality of education for pupils in the area concerned.'.

New clause 44—School governing body to hold meeting of parents on change of category—

'Where—

(a) a local education authority or the governing body of a maintained school wish to consider a proposal to make a prescribed alteration such as is mentioned in subsection 17(2), and

(b) the local education authority or the governing body is capable of proposing that alteration, no decision to make the proposal shall be made without there having first been convened by the local authority or the governing body (as the case may be) a meeting at which the parents of pupils registered at the school concerned shall have been provided with the opportunity to discuss and make representations on a draft of the proposal.'.

New clause 53—Duty to encourage schools to become self-governing and to acquire a trust—

'(1) A person to whom this section applies shall ensure that their functions relating to maintained schools are (so far as they are capable of being exercised) exercised with a view to encouraging all maintained schools to become self-governing, and to acquire a foundation.

(2) In this section "self-governing" in relation to a maintained school means a foundation, voluntary aided or foundation special school, or an Academy.

(3) This section applies to—

(a) a local education authority in England;

(b) the Secretary of State.'.

New clause 56—Abolition of surplus places rule—

'A local education authority in England may not reject a proposal for the establishment or alteration of a maintained school solely on the grounds that it would create surplus places at other schools in the area.'.

New clause 57—Prohibition on the establishment of new community schools—

'No new community or community special school may be established in England after the coming into force of this Act.'.

New clause 58—Role of local authorities—

'(1) A local authority in England may not publish its own proposal for the establishment of new community schools.

(2) In exercising its functions in relation to school organisation a local authority in England must act with a view to commissioning school places rather than providing them directly.'.

New clause 61—Schools commissioner—

'(1) There shall be a Schools Commissioner.

(2) The Schools Commissioner shall have a duty to encourage schools to become Trust schools.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), a Trust school is a foundation school with a foundation.'.

New clause 62—Power of Secretary of State to require a school to become a foundation school—

'(1) If the Secretary of State determines that education at a school is unsatisfactory, he may by order require the governing body of a school to acquire foundation status.

(2) Where the Secretary of State issues an order under subsection (1), the governing body of the school shall publish proposals in accordance with sections 18 to 20.'.

New clause 64—Adoption of foundation status—

'All existing maintained schools may apply to the Secretary of State to adopt foundation status, and the Secretary of State shall grant such foundation status unless there are overriding circumstances which make this impossible.'.

New clause 48—Register of institutions approved to act as a foundation of a school—

'(1) The Secretary of State shall establish and maintain a register of all institutions approved by him to act as or take part in the foundation of a foundation school.

(2) In considering whether to approve an institution under this section, the Secretary of State shall consider evidence that the institution is—

(a) capable of contributing to the raising of school standards,

(b) capable of promoting community cohesion,

(c) not involved in activities inappropriate for children and young people,

(d) capable of conforming to the charitable objectives of the foundation, and

(e) able to demonstrate that its trustees are not involved in illegal activities or any other activities incompatible with the good reputation of any school of which it may be the foundation or in the foundation of which it may participate.

(3) An institution may not act as nor take any part in the foundation of a foundation school unless registered as approved by the Secretary of State under this section.

(4) Regulations under this section may make provision as to—

(a) the form and manner in which applications for registration are to be made;

(b) the documentary and other evidence which is to accompany applications for registration;

(c) the registration, on the establishment of the register, of institutions which have not made such applications;

(d) the matters which are to be recorded in the register against the institutions registered in it;

(e) the restoration and alteration of entries;

(f) the information contained in the register which may be made available for inspection by members of the public, and the circumstances in which and the conditions subject to which that information may be made available; and

(g) such other matters as may be determined by the Secretary of State.'.

New clause 26—Requirements as to composition of governing bodies—

'(1) The governing body of a maintained school, Academy, city technology college or city college for the technology of the arts may comprise—

(a) foundation governors;

(b) elected parent governors;

(c) staff representatives; and

(d) community representatives.

(2) Foundation schools shall not appoint a majority of governors who are foundation governors and in no case shall governors who are foundation governors outnumber elected parent governors.'.

[Mr. Speaker]

Amendment No. 7, in page 2, line 14 [Clause 2], at end insert—

'(3B) A local education authority may discharge its duty under subsection (3A)(a) in relation to secondary schools by encouraging a diversity of specialism among the community and voluntary schools which it maintains.'.

Alan Johnson: May I set out the Government's position on the new clause and the other propositions in this group of amendments?

At the heart of the Bill is the Government's desire and determination to ensure that every child is able to fulfil their potential. That means ensuring that every school achieves the standards of the best but, above all, it means ensuring that children from deprived backgrounds receive the same educational opportunities as more fortunate children. The determination that all of our children should able to fulfil their potential lies behind the school organisation provisions in part 2. We are creating a new system in which all schools operate with as much freedom as possible within a strong framework that guarantees fairness and promotes collaboration.

Clause 1 demonstrates our commitment in that respect, and it gives local authorities new duties to carry out all their education functions with a view to ensuring high standards for every pupil and, if our amendment is accepted later in proceedings, to promote fair access. Over the past nine years, we have made significant progress in achieving these aspirations. Last year's results at every key stage were the best ever. We have radically reformed the work-force—there are more, better trained teachers supported by a wide range of professionals—and we have ensured that there are fewer schools in special measures. Schools that are in difficulties are turned round more quickly.

Those are impressive achievements, but we cannot afford to stand still. There are still too many underperforming schools and too many children, especially in deprived areas, who are not given the educational opportunities that they need. We know what works. The best schools are self-confident, with strong leadership and governance infusing everything that they do. They harness other available sources of expertise, whether from other schools, colleges, businesses or the voluntary and community sectors. We have seen the benefits of such an approach through the success of specialist schools and academies. The proposals in the Bill extend those opportunities to all schools and give local authorities a distinct new role as the commissioners, rather than the providers, of school places, the champions of parents and pupils and the guarantors of high standards.

Local authorities are central to the new system. Rather than sounding the death knell for local authority involvement in education, as some have suggested, if anything the Bill marks a rebirth of their role. There are new powers to intervene in failing schools and to take the lead in commissioning school places in line with the needs of the communities that they serve. For the first time local authorities will be able to propose expansion to or the addition of special educational needs provision to all maintained schools, and they will take a leading role in ensuring fairness and helping to overcome disadvantage.

The Bill also puts parents at the heart of the system. Clause 3 gives local authorities a duty to respond to parental concerns, and we have published illustrative guidance which sets out how this duty should be met. Clause 35 requires all governing bodies to have regard to the views of parents, and any proposals relating to new schools or the acquisition of trusts must be subject to full consultation with parents and the wider community.

We believe that these provisions provide the right degree of rigour, tempered by local flexibility. For that reason, we think that compulsory local ballots are an unnecessary red herring, whether they are designed to trigger competitions, as the Opposition suggest in new clause 19, to approve proposals within competitions, as proposed by my hon. Friends in new clause 17 and amendment No. 5, or to approve proposals to become a foundation school, as proposed by my hon. Friends in new clause 16. Compulsory ballots or petitions on any of these issues would be unnecessarily bureaucratic, requiring expensive procedures and precise definitions of process and electorates that would in many cases be inappropriate.

In respect of new clause 16 and the proposition to ballot parents if a school plans to become a trust, I remind the House that a governing body that wished to hold a ballot would be entirely free to do so as part of locally determined arrangements for consultation, but that should be its choice, not a requirement dictated from Whitehall. Where there is controversy, it may make sense to hold a ballot. It is certainly important that we ensure that parental views are adequately taken into account through consultation. Where a school decides to acquire a trust, the local authority has the power to refer that decision to the adjudicator if it believes that the consultation process has not been followed properly or that adequate attention has not been paid to the views of respondents. That is an extremely important check on the autonomy of the governing body.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Can the Secretary of State confirm that it will not be regarded as a poor consultation process if a governing body decides not to conduct an indicative ballot, and that that therefore will not be grounds for the local authority to refer it to the schools adjudicator? Can he confirm that he will put nothing to that effect in the guidance when he firms up the draft?

Alan Johnson: I can, in the sense that not holding a ballot would not be failure to consult, but if the local authority was aware that there was a very strong body of opinion among parents or a demand among parent governors for a ballot, and that the outcome of the consultation in some way conflicted with that view, it may then refer the matter to the adjudicator. The local authority must make sure that there has been adequate consultation with parents, and if that consultation has taken place, that the parental views are reflected in the outcome. What we say is that to insist in legislation that on every occasion, irrespective of circumstances and regardless of how controversial the change may be—and I predict that most will not be controversial—the only method of consultation must be a ballot is too dictatorial and unnecessarily prescriptive.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): Ballots are mandatory when a change is in prospect from a grammar school to a community school, so why should the same principle not apply to a change from community school status to foundation status?

Alan Johnson: Because this is not a change from a grammar school to a community school. We set out the arrangements when we were in opposition in 1996, and we set them out again when we entered government in 1997. Incidentally, the matter is different from grant-maintained schools, for which ballots were also required. We are discussing a school that remains part of the local authority, that continues to pay the same terms and conditions to its teachers and that is funded in exactly the same way as any other community school by the local authority. If the governing body wants to move to trust status, it will be required to consult parents; incidentally, consultation with parents in feeder schools is also part of the procedures and guidance. It is unnecessarily bureaucratic to insist prescriptively that there must be a ballot in all circumstances.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has mentioned grant-maintained schools. Does he agree that one of the many failings of grant-maintained schools concerned the issue of the ballot in which the parent whose child was just about to leave the school had the same vote as the parent whose child was going to spend another five years at the school, while the parent of the child who was just about to join the school had no vote at all? The ballot raised more problems that it solved. Because schools have many partners these days, it is important that consultation goes wider than simply parents.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is right. I believe that grant-maintained schools had to hold a ballot every year, but Conservative Members know more about that than me. All I know is that that was a bad policy which it would be bad to replicate, particularly in relation to ballots, where the problems that my hon. Friend has mentioned were apparent.

I am more sympathetic to new clause 44 tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). In practice, however, I believe that many governing bodies will hold the sort of public meeting required by his proposed new clause, and I do not think that we should make such a meeting an absolute requirement.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): The change from a community school to a trust school is fundamental. Will my right hon. Friend indicate how he can ensure that adequate consultation is carried out involving all the people who could be affected by the potential change?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend will know that we have set out guidance on that matter, which is available in the House of Commons Library. The proposal is that the governing body must agree, and if it does not agree, then the matter will go no further. If the governing body believes that the proposal should be put to consultation, then it must be consultation not only with parents at that school, but with parents at feeder schools, too. That consultation must be meaningful and real, which is why we have introduced the back-stop of the local authority being able to refer the issue to the schools adjudicator, if it believes that the consultation has not been done properly. There are many ways to consult, and my point is that a ballot is not the only one.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): I have a different problem. Will the Secretary of State explain why the governors of, for example, Banbury school should want to change to trust status? Given all those caveats, what is in it for the parents and children of a school such as Banbury school in my constituency to acquire trust status? It may be that I am being particularly stupid, but I have not got that yet.

Alan Johnson: I would never accuse the hon. Gentleman of being particularly stupid. A school would take that decision to give it more control, to introduce autonomy and to federate and co-operate with, for example, a university, a successful school, a further education college or a business trust. Such arrangements exist at the moment, but they are precarious. Sometimes they depend on one or two head teachers or local authority leaders being particularly forceful, but when such people move on, the federation falls apart. The provision will establish such federations on a more permanent basis. For all those reasons, particularly that of having more control and more decision making locally at the school, it is a very good proposition.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Could the Secretary of State help me with something that has slightly amazed me? This morning, I received by fax a letter about this group of amendments and the Bill in general that urged me to vote against the amendments and against the Bill on Third Reading. It came from the West Chelmsford Labour party. Why does he think that it has done that?

Alan Johnson: I have spent many happy hours deliberating on how the West Chelmsford Labour party reached its decision, but I still have not managed to fathom it out.

4 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Like some of my hon. Friends, I do not think that there are enough powers for foundation schools. Would it be possible to extend under order the powers that are available to them if they are a success?

Alan Johnson: There are no plans to move further than what is currently in the regulations. We now have a real opportunity to learn from what works best and to apply that. At the moment, schools can opt for various strands, including being a specialist school or an academy, but a whole host of bureaucracy is associated with all of them. The formulation of trusts maintaining those schools within the local authority family of schools is a very attractive proposition, which is why I think that it will be widely supported.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): I welcome the Secretary of State to his post. Does he agree that the attributes that he ascribed to new foundation schools are precisely those that applied to grant-maintained schools, except that they did not have a ballot or benefit from some of the unusual funding arrangements from which foundation schools may benefit? None the less, in view of the very successful grant-maintained schools in my constituency, I welcome the foundation schools that he is introducing.

Alan Johnson: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. Grant-maintained schools could select, had more money, were outside the local authority family, and could pay their staff on the basis of different terms and conditions. There is a world of difference between our proposals and grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I have a very simple question. How many schools does the Secretary of State believe will go for trust status, say, by the end of this Parliament?

Alan Johnson: If I were to hazard a guess—I may be making myself a hostage to fortune—I would say a great many.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Can the Secretary of State confirm that the new clause does not prohibit a school from federating or otherwise forging a link with a private university? I ask that because the University of Buckingham, an outstanding institution in my constituency, is the only independent university in the United Kingdom.

Alan Johnson: It is also the only university that does a two-year degree. There would be nothing to stop a school federating with that university.

Trust schools will provide the drive and innovation of new approaches and new partners. In some cases, the governing body might wish the trust to appoint a majority of governors where it believes that a charitable foundation can strengthen the leadership and governance of a school. We are therefore resisting new clause 26, tabled by the Liberal Democrats, which would prevent that possibility. Majority governance is not at the expense of parental engagement. Parents will continue to make up one third of the governing body in trust schools, as in all maintained schools. Furthermore, a trust that appoints the majority of governors will be required to establish a parent council.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): But surely the point is that there would be a reduction in the number of elected parent governors. It is not adequate to substitute a parent council where there is a duty to consult. As elected politicians we should be supporting the right to have that kind of democratic decision making.

Alan Johnson: It is a matter for the governing body to decide. It can decide whether to become a trust, and then decide whether to allow the trust to have a majority. That happens in a voluntary-aided school in my constituency, and it has worked successfully for many years. If the governing body makes that decision, parents must make up the same proportion of the governing body. As for whether they are elected parents or appointed parents, they are parents. The safeguards in the Bill maintain the voice of parents. New clause 26 would take away the right to have that majority.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that the Select Committee recommended that all parent governors on a trust should be elected. How can he argue that parents on a trust represent parents with children at a school unless those parents have a right to elect their representatives?

Alan Johnson: I believe that governing bodies that decide to have a majority trust—I stress that it is governing bodies' decision—will predominantly be of successful schools that federate with unsuccessful schools and try to raise the standards in the unsuccessful school. When part of the reason for the former's success is the quality of its governing body, I believe that the preponderance of governors from the trust, including parents, will try to replicate that in the unsuccessful school. However, that can be done only with the complete agreement of the governing body. If the governing body decides not to take that route, it still has a trust, but not majority trust representation on it.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): If a governing body decided go for trust status, would it be required, before it was granted that status, to declare its attitude towards parent representation?

Alan Johnson: No, it would not. The other important point to bear in mind is that, if the circumstances that I have described occur—that is, there is a majority on the board of governors from the trust—a parent council must be set up. It will be an important voice in the way in which the school is run. All trust school governing bodies would still be required to have at least one elected parent and many would have more.

I am confident that many schools will use the opportunity of trust status to put existing collaborative arrangements on a more secure footing. However, forcing new schools to be part of federations, for which amendments Nos. 88 to 92, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden), would provide, is unnecessarily restrictive. For example, it would be unreasonable for a prospective new school to have to receive the agreement of at least one other school in the area that they would have a single governing body before it could be established.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has expressed reservations about including a requirement for federation in the Bill. It is therefore incumbent on him to spell out a little more precisely how he envisages collaboration, which, he says, is already inherent in the process, working between trust schools and other schools in the local authority area. Will he do that?

Alan Johnson: Once we have established the schools commissioner, his role will be to act as a broker for schools interested in forging trusts with universities, colleges, business trusts, charities and so on, and setting up the arrangements. We greatly favour encouraging federations. The problem with amendment No. 88 is that it is prescriptive and would provide that there must be a federation on every occasion. Some schools will want to have the benefits of being a foundation without having a federation. The vast majority will not, especially given the 14 to 19 factors, which will put vocational education back at the top of the agenda, where it should have been probably 62 years ago.

Mr. Marsden: My right hon. Friend mentioned the schools commissioner. Does he envisage the schools commissioner playing a key role in brokering collaboration between trust schools and others in a local authority area?

Alan Johnson: Yes, as would the local authority.

We are firmly persuaded that trust schools represent an important step in our ambition to raise standards for all. Good governance allied to effective leadership, high quality teaching and a flexible curriculum need to be a feature of every school. We have listened to the representations of, among others, the Education and Skills Committee. Consequently, we have agreed that, in some circumstances, a new community school could make sense in a specific area.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), who is now the Chief Whip—and whose wisdom and sagacity we have all long admired, even before she became Chief Whip—set out in Committee the criteria that we intend to use in determining whether a local authority should be allowed to enter a community school into a competition. We have now tabled amendment No. 42 and new clause 33 to give effect to those commitments.

The criteria would allow local authorities with an annual performance assessment—APA—score of 4 automatically to enter a community school proposal. There are 11 authorities in that category at present. Conversely, some authorities would not be allowed to enter a community school proposal until their performance improved. That group would comprise authorities with an APA score of 1, and those with an APA score of 2 and either more than 15 per cent. failing schools or fewer than 15 per cent. voluntary and foundation schools or academies for the relevant phase. At present, 10 authorities fall into that group at secondary level.

The majority of authorities will need to apply for consent. Each case will be considered on its merits, but I would expect to approve requests from local authorities that have an APA score of 3 and either a lower than average percentage of failing schools or a higher than average percentage of voluntary and foundation schools or academies. This presumption would also apply to authorities that have an APA score of 2, a high percentage of voluntary and foundation schools or academies and no failing schools. Some 90 authorities would benefit from this presumption at secondary level.

For the remaining minority of 40 or so authorities, I would like to make it clear that all applications will be considered on their merits, and that there will be no presumption against consent. In particular, no authority will be ruled out simply because it has no, or only a few, faith schools. I recognise that there is more to diversity than labels and governance structures. Schools may have different curriculum specialisms and different approaches to education that give them a distinct character or ethos. So, while I am committed to retaining the simple, objective test of diversity, as I have just set out, I will consider a much wider range of factors relating to diversity in reaching a decision on whether to give consent for those authorities that want to enter a competition.

Helen Jones: The key here is surely the way in which we define diversity. The Secretary of State has talked about diversity in terms of structures, and he will be aware that I have tabled an amendment that picks up on much of what he has said. It would allow local authorities to satisfy the diversity criteria by maintaining a range of specialisms in their maintained schools. What is the Government's attitude to my amendment?

Alan Johnson: I shall come to that in just a second, if my hon. Friend will be patient.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the criteria should act as a spur to local authorities not only to develop their strategic capacity, but to deliver excellence in our schools?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend has made a crucial point. In places with a long history of failing schools, we really need to galvanise people's attention. These measures will give a real incentive to local authorities in that regard.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that our right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith) was extremely generous when she considered the criteria in Committee and examined the number of local authorities that would be able to enter schools for competitions? Will the Secretary of State also confirm that there are now many more, following the representations of Labour Back Benchers?

Alan Johnson: That was as a result of the representations of not only Labour Back Benchers, but the Local Government Association, which is not particularly dominated by members of the Labour party. The LGA made a number of very important points on this matter. We have therefore come to an arrangement that strikes the right balance.

Sarah Teather: Does the Secretary of State recognise that the annual performance assessment relates to the overall performance of a local authority? A council's ability to collect rubbish might not necessarily relate to its ability to run schools.

Alan Johnson: The ability to collect rubbish is very important, but we depend on educational attainment in regard to this particular score.

Tom Levitt: Further to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith), can the Secretary of State spell out his answer, given that that there is no reason why, five years down the line, every education authority should not be a grade three or grade four, thus effectively relieving him of an obligation to use the veto?

Alan Johnson: That is an important point. If the Bill allows that to take place, it will be beneficial to every Member's constituency, as there are some constituencies that have very good schools but that still have too many failing schools nearby.

4.15 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said about the way in which he will approach diversity, as he has extended considerably the number of local authorities that can reasonably expect to be able to enter the competition. Will he confirm that he would expect the adjudicator, in adjudicating on the competition, to take a similar approach to the question of diversity?

Alan Johnson: Yes, the adjudicator will do that, as that will be part of the regulations that we will produce.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Following that last point, as my right hon. Friend has mentioned faith schools, will he specifically instruct the adjudicator that diversity of faith is not one of the criteria in determining whether a local authority has diverse provision or, in a competition, whether a particular school should be allowed to go forward in a particular form?

Alan Johnson: I repeat: the fact that a local authority does not have a faith school, or has few faith schools, would not be a factor for me to veto that application. That would be the case with the schools adjudicator, too, as we would be working from the same regulations. Those factors will be incorporated into regulations that will be made under the proposed new clause. Clearly, this secondary consideration is a more subjective test than the percentage of different categories of school, which remains the prior test. Therefore, it will be for the authority to set out in its application how a new community school would build on existing diversity in the area.

I assure my hon. Friends who have tabled amendment No. 7, including my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) who just intervened, that the wider definition of diversity would extend to clause 2. Therefore, there is no need to set out its meaning in the Bill. The arrangements will enable high-performing authorities and those with diverse provision to publish proposals for a new community school. We also want to demonstrate to the weakest and least diverse authorities that they should open up opportunities to other providers, on which my hon. Friends have made points in interventions. It will then be for the schools adjudicator to consider all proposals submitted and to make the final decision on which proposal should be approved.

We believe that that approach strikes the right balance. We do not accept amendment No. 15, tabled by the Liberal Democrats, which would allow all local authorities to publish proposals for new community schools. Nor do we accept new clauses 57 and 58 and amendments Nos. 101 and 102, tabled by the official Opposition, which would mean that no local authority would do so. As ever, between those two extremes, we are taking the third and most sensible way. Similarly, amendment No. 111, submitted by the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), would prevent all but the best local authorities from proposing new community schools outside competitions. As set out in Committee, we would relax the need for a competition only where there were good reasons for doing so, such as in the case of the amalgamation of an infant and junior school or to facilitate a fresh start in that school.

John Bercow: The Secretary of State referred a few moments ago to regulations that were imminent or to be published in due course, which is something of a legislative hobby horse of mine. Can he tell the House whether those regulations are to be subject to the negative procedure of the House or to its affirmative counterpart? Are they available now in draft form? If so, can we see them? And if not, given their importance and centrality—I ask in the politest possible way—why not?

Alan Johnson: First, they will be subject to the negative procedure. Secondly, we tried hard, as Members who served on the Committee will accept, to get guidance and regulations published in draft form so that they could be scrutinised in Committee. That has not happened, and the hon. Gentleman will know, from the nine years that we have been in the House together, that that does not happen on every Bill. We have tried hard, and we will try hard in relation to those regulations as the Bill goes through the Lords, to make sure that Members have the benefit of that information.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend and his predecessor on making the new skeleton admissions code available to the Standing Committee for scrutiny: it helped us greatly to understand how much tougher the protections against bad admission practices would be.

Amendment No. 41 gives local education authorities an extra duty to ensure "fair access to educational opportunity".

How does my right hon. Friend think that that will work in practice? He skated over it quite quickly at the beginning.

Alan Johnson: I expect it to operate in the context of admissions forums. I hope to say more about that later, but if my hon. Friend thinks that I have not dealt with it adequately, I will allow her to intervene again.

Judy Mallaber: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Alan Johnson: I will take one more intervention. Then I must make some progress.

Judy Mallaber: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he just said that if an infant school and a junior school amalgamated to form a primary school, they would not have to be subject to a competition?

Alan Johnson: Yes. That is the kind of provision that clause 9 makes.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I hope very much that the Secretary of State will join us in making a robust case for the Government's school reforms, and I look forward to working with him on that.

The Secretary of State just described one of our new clauses, which provides for new schools not to be community schools, as extreme. Will he confirm that our new clause is based on the Government's own schools White Paper, which states:

"All new schools will be self-governing Foundation, voluntary aided, Trust schools or Academies"?

When did he decide that the Government's own White Paper was extreme?

Alan Johnson: Last time I was at the Dispatch Box talking about higher education, the hon. Gentleman and his party were supporting a policy that the hon. Member for "Have I Got News For You" recently described as "bonkers". I am pleased that Conservative Members have come down from the planet Zog and engaged in a proper debate about education.

As part of that debate, let me mention that very few published White Papers end up in a perfect form, so that every chapter and verse and every dot and comma are reflected in the ensuing Bill. The whole point of a White Paper is to precede consultation, and our consultation has been very fruitful—not just the consultation among Labour Members, but consultation with Members in all parts of the House and, as I have said, with the Local Government Association. I believe that there are two extremes, and that as a result of our consultation we have found a perfect third way.

We believe that the approach I have described is preferable to new clause 38, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North, which would require a local authority to work up its proposals before knowing whether it would be given permission to enter them. I believe that that could lead to a significant amount of unnecessary work.

While we accept that there may be a role for new community schools, we do not agree that there should be a mechanism allowing foundation schools to revert to community status. We have included provisions that enable the governing body to remove a trust, and if a foundation school is failing, the local authority will be able to intervene and can, if necessary, close the school and trigger a new competition. For those reasons, we shall resist new clause 23 and amendments Nos. 12 to 14.

Anne Snelgrove: Is this not one of the issues that put clear red water between us and the Opposition? We have examined the strategic role of local education authorities, and have strengthened it. We are bringing trust schools into the family of schools within LEAs. Grant-maintained schools removed money and set school against school; our trust schools will not be like that.

Alan Johnson: I agree. If we examine the strategic role of local authorities in the context of "Every Child Matters", the Green Paper on youth issues and the 14-to-19 agenda, we see an exciting new role for commissioners of education rather than providers, which entrenches the part played by those authorities in a much more meaningful way.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred to new clause 23, which I tabled, and to subsequent amendments. Will he confirm that he has just told the House that the move from comprehensive to trust status is an irreversible, one-directional process? A comprehensive school can become a trust school, but once it is a trust school it cannot revert to being a comprehensive.

Alan Johnson: Let me make it absolutely clear: if the governing body of a trust decided that it wanted to leave the trust, only a third of governors would be needed to trigger that process. At least two thirds of governors have to vote in favour of maintaining the trust for it to continue, so there are important safeguards and trigger mechanisms in the system.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Johnson: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith).

Ms Angela C. Smith: Does my right hon. Friend agree that trust schools will not be community schools, and that they will remain comprehensive schools?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; indeed, the only voluntary aided school in my constituency uses banding—and has done so for many years—which is pure comprehensive intake. She has made a really important contribution in dealing with the misapprehension that a trust school will not be a comprehensive school.

Paul Farrelly rose—

Alan Johnson: I will give way one more time and then make some progress.

Paul Farrelly: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on introducing the safeguard concerning the removal of a majority of governors or of a foundation that is not performing. But if he is not going to provide a safeguard concerning the proportion of parents who are elected governors, how can we guarantee that there will be a sufficient proportion of independent governors to trigger the safeguard that he has installed?

Alan Johnson: At least a third of governors will have to be parents, and in the circumstances that my hon. Friend envisages, where there is a majority trust, there would be the parent council. Teachers and the local community would also be represented on the trust. The local authority, moreover, must be represented on the governing body, so I believe that enough safeguards are in place.

We believe that there needs to be a clear distinction between provider and commissioner in relation to trust schools. Therefore, while it is appropriate that local authorities play a part in trusts, the extent of their role should be limited to 20 per cent. of the membership or voting rights. That is consistent with provisions in local government legislation on local authority involvement in companies. We are therefore resisting amendments Nos. 9 to 11, which would grant local authorities 50 per cent. membership of trusts.

[Alan Johnson]

Of course, the key role of local authorities will be their ability to take strategic decisions about the provision of school places across their area. They will decide, taking on board the views of local people, when new schools are required and how best to use the record capital investment that we are making available through the building schools for the future programme.

New clause 18, tabled by the Conservatives, would fetter local authorities' discretion by requiring them to establish new schools if certain conditions relating to the number of failing schools or a lack of diversity were met. I am sympathetic to the aim of the new clause—to create more choice for parents—but I do not believe that such a mechanistic approach is appropriate. On new clause 56, also tabled by the Conservatives, I can confirm that there is no surplus places rule that would prevent a local authority from running a competition, or from agreeing proposals to expand a good school, simply because there are more than enough places available. Capital support for authorities is now formula-based and there is no bar to its use, whatever the state of surplus in a given area.

Mr. Redwood: Does the Secretary of State share my anger at the fact that some people have absolutely no choice and have to send their children to a very unsatisfactory school, whereas the rich have an enormous amount of choice? What is he really going to do to narrow that gap?

Alan Johnson: I hesitate before saying that I share the right hon. Gentleman's anger, but I do think it a matter of considerable concern that in all our constituencies—certainly in mine—this lack of choice dogs many constituents. Provisions in the Bill such as free transport will help to provide such choice, but the biggest guarantor of the educational choice and diversity that we want to see is the record levels of investment that we are putting into our schools.

On new clause 56, which is entitled "Abolition of surplus places rule", as I said, there is no such rule. Let me reaffirm something that my predecessor made clear on Second Reading. No school will be forced to acquire a trust or to become a foundation school. New clauses 21 and 53, proposed by the Conservatives, are designed to place duties on the Secretary of State and local authorities to encourage schools to become trust schools. There is a danger that such statutory duties could lead to an undue amount of pressure being applied. We firmly believe that trust status has to be a decision freely entered into by a governing body. The only exception is for failing schools, where local authorities will be able to use their new intervention powers to force collaboration. However, we do not accept new clause 62, tabled by the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), which would allow the Secretary of State to impose a change of foundation status. It has to be a local decision that meets local needs.

4.30 pm

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): On the day after Second Reading, the previous Secretary of State confirmed that schools choosing not to go down the trust route would not be disadvantaged in any way. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that and tell me exactly where in the Bill that is made clear?

Alan Johnson: I can confirm that. Perhaps my hon. Friend and I could have a chat afterwards, so I could point to the various clauses that insist that local authority maintained schools receive their funding on exactly the same basis, with the same pay and conditions for teachers, as other schools. There are several additional safeguards. I can happily give my hon. Friend the affirmation that he seeks.

The role of the schools commissioner will be to provide support and encouragement to schools. New clause 61, tabled by the hon. Member for Reading, East, would establish the schools commissioner as a statutory office. While I agree with the role set out in the new clause, it is not necessary to define every facet directly in the Bill. The different facets have been included in the job description for applicants for the schools commissioner post. I reassure Members that the commissioner's annual report will be made available to both Houses of Parliament and to the Select Committee on Education and Skills.

Mr. Marsden: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for confirming that the schools commissioner will have a role in reporting regularly both to Parliament and to the Select Committee, but there is an important omission in his predecessor's letter to the Standing Committee, which defined the role. It did not include reference to children with special educational needs. Can my right hon. Friend confirm today that that will also be part of the schools commissioner's remit in ensuring fair admissions?

Alan Johnson: I can confirm that. I am aware that my hon. Friend has had discussions about children with special educational needs. We intend to deal with the matter in a separate tranche of measures, so I can give him the assurance that he seeks.

Support provided by the schools commissioner and by local authorities may include consultancy advice to groups of parents wishing to set up a new school or to enter a competition, but I cannot accept the strictures of the Conservatives' new clause 22, which could lead to a local authority having to expend considerable resources supporting proposals that would ultimately fail. Our guidance to local authorities in clause 3 sets out a much more proportionate approach for responding to parental demands about the provision of schools.

On the important matter of safeguards, my predecessor said on Second Reading that there would be "strong safeguards to ensure that all trusts operate in the best interest of children. All trusts will be charitable, and I will issue guidance to prevent the acquisition of inappropriate trusts."

She added that

"perhaps the most important safeguard will be the common sense of parents and governing bodies. They will decide whether it is in a school's interest to adopt a particular trust."—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1464-65.]

Draft guidance was sent to members of the Committee on 20 April and is available in the Library. First, all trusts must meet the legal requirements set out in the Bill; that is, they must be incorporated charities. Secondly, there must be adequate consultation. If a governing body has not consulted, or has not properly taken into account the representations received, the local authority may refer its decision to the schools adjudicator.

Thirdly, proposals must set out evidence that the trust will contribute to raising standards at the school and will promote community cohesion. The local authority may refer the decision to the schools adjudicator if it believes that the trust will have a negative impact on standards. The ability of a local authority to refer proposals to the adjudicator is an important safeguard. We cannot therefore accept amendments Nos. 105 to 108, by which the Conservatives seek to remove that power to refer.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend confirm whether a local authority will have the power to refer to the adjudicator a case where it thinks that the trust may not be able to fulfil its duty to promote social cohesion?

Alan Johnson: I think that I have set out the reasons for the local authority to refer to the schools adjudicator. They include standards and whether parents have been properly consulted and whether that consultation has been listened to. The schools adjudicator must take into account community cohesion in making decisions. The fourth point that I was coming to is that trust members—

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Alan Johnson: I am never going to get to the fourth point. I will give way.

Mrs. Dorries: If a school were not performing as well as it should but felt that it could improve standards by embracing trust schools status, and if a local authority's objection to that school's proposal was that it should not become a trust school because of the prevailing standards in the school, what would the adjudicator do?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Lady will forgive me if I do not go into hypothetical situations. The whole point is that the local authority can refer and the schools adjudicator will make the decision. That is a very important safeguard.

Fourthly, trust members and proposed trustees must not be involved in activities that may be considered inappropriate for children and young people—for example, those associated with tobacco, gambling, adult entertainment and alcohol—or that could bring the school into disrepute. Fifthly, regulations will disqualify specific categories of people from being trustees. In addition, the Secretary of State will have a reserve power to remove and to appoint individual trustees.

Sixth in this list of safeguards is the fact that trust schools will remain local authority maintained schools, with the budget delegated to the governing body, not to the trust. The trust's functions will be to appoint governors to the school and to hold assets on trust for the school. The Bill will place new protections around the disposal of assets held by foundations.

I am adding a seventh safeguard: I confirm for those hon. Members who have raised the matter with me that trust schools will be inspected by Ofsted in the same way as other publicly funded schools. Ofsted will introduce a number of changes to school inspection to capture the contribution of trusts to their schools. It will add specific references to trusts in the self-evaluation form—the basis on which the new school inspections will be undertaken. The changes will require trust schools to identify their status and to describe their distinctive aims and special features. Inspectors would use that information as the starting point in assessing a trust's contribution to the school's overall performance.

The framework for school inspection already provides opportunity for inspectors to examine and to comment on a trust's impact on the leadership and management of a school, and thereby on all other aspects of the school's work. However, to make that explicit, Ofsted will amend the guidance on conducting the inspection to include a requirement for inspectors to assess the impact of governors appointed by a trust on the school's work.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I am appreciative of the many safeguards that my right hon. Friend outlines. There has been a significant movement in that respect, but I put it to him that a slightly cumbersome structure will be put in place. If Ofsted, in carrying out the very welcome inspection that he confirms will now cover trust schools, and indeed trusts, uncovers grounds for concern about a trust's performance, it is not clear to me what mechanism will ensure that the trust is brought to an end. How will an alternative mechanism be put in place to ensure that the school is properly managed in future?

Alan Johnson: The important points are the Secretary of State's powers and the obligation on the governing body to respond to the Ofsted report. A combination of all the powers, now set out in nine different safeguards, will allow us to meet the concerns that my right hon. Friend and others have raised with us.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): What on earth were my right hon. Friend's predecessors thinking when they considered a regime in which the Charity Commission would have been the regulatory body for trust schools?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend asks an impossible question: I cannot say what previous Ministers were thinking. The Charity Commission has an important role as one of the safeguards, but it is not the only safeguard. The fact that the schools will be registered charitable trusts means that the commission has to have an input. The point that he has raised consistently is that that is not enough of a safeguard to meet the real fears that hon. Members on both sides of the House have had about inappropriate trusts, and I have set out in detail some real safeguards that I hope will meet their concerns.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend clarify the answer he gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford)? Is he saying that trust schools will be inspected to the same standards that will apply to local authority schools? The White Paper said that a failing school would be given a year to turn itself around, but did he consider that extreme?

Alan Johnson: No. My hon. Friend mixes two different points. Trust schools will be subject to the same regime, but with the added safeguards that I have described to meet the concerns about inappropriate trusts. We also want to be able to turn around failing schools in 12 months, which at present takes on average 21 months. When we came to power, it took 24 months, but it is still too long. The measures in the Bill to turn failing schools around more quickly are accepted by every contributor to the debate.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): Can the Secretary of State confirm that trust schools will not have to pay for inspections by Ofsted, as some other independent schools have to do? [Interruption.]

Alan Johnson: As my hon. Friends point out, the problem with that question is that trust schools will not be independent schools. The Ofsted regime for trust schools will be exactly the same as that for any other local authority schools.

As a further safeguard, the schools commissioner will hold a detailed record of all proposals relating to trusts and make it available via the departmental website. That will allow a school interested in acquiring a trust to access information about a particular trust and to follow up any questions with the school or trust in question.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): On the point about turning failing schools around, a school in my constituency had to be put on special measures, but has now improved its teaching standards from 36 per cent. to 94 per cent. in 12 months. Ofsted said that that was one of the fastest turnarounds it had seen. The school had a lot of problems, but my constituents have seen real improvements.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is right. All hon. Members want to see such schools turned around as quickly as possible, and she confirms that it can be done.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The Secretary of State has mentioned all the safeguards relating to Ofsted inspections. What safeguards exist to ensure the consistency of Ofsted teams? Visits to schools by some teams are very positive experiences, but on occasions an Ofsted team has a destructive effect on the school and its community.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Lady raises some important issues that have been considered as part of the review of Ofsted, which is of course responsible to Her Majesty's inspectorate. I accept that important issues need to be addressed, but they fall outside this Bill and are not specifically related to the point that I am making about Ofsted being a new and added safeguard to meet the concerns that people have about trusts.

We believe that such a record, combined with the safeguards I have outlined, is preferable to the formal register of approved trusts that would be required by new clause 25, which was tabled by the Liberal Democrats; by new clause 48, tabled by my hon. Friends; and by amendment No. 96. Allowing schools to choose a trust partner only from a register would fetter the freedom of governing bodies to decide what is best for their schools, in light of their individual circumstances. It would lead to additional bureaucracy and delay, especially when schools were considering local, community-based trusts that would not benefit from a centralised process for formal approval.

4.45 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend envisage that the website to which he has referred will be updated regularly, with trusts being entered in such a way that people accessing the site will be able to regard it as a register?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes a nice try, and I agree that that website, like all websites, should be updated regularly. It is an informal focal point for the provision of information. He might try to call it a register, but I would not.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Is my right hon. Friend aware that two city academies—the Mossbourne and the Petchey academies—have been set up, in my constituency and in the neighbouring area of Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, by trusts connected with two Hackney boys who made good? So far, those trusts have shown no interest in running schools in other parts of the country. They are Hackney focused, and we in Hackney welcome that.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes an important point. In my two weeks as Secretary of State, Mossbourne is the only school that I have been able to visit so far. I confirm everything that she says about that excellent school.

The former Minister for Schools committed to include in the Bill a requirement for all trusts to advance education and to promote community cohesion. Government amendments Nos. 43 to 47 make good that commitment. We want there to be no doubt that trust schools, like any other maintained school, will have a role in developing in pupils an understanding and appreciation of the values of others. They will provide equal opportunities for students from different backgrounds and encourage strong and positive relationships between them.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): I very much welcome the promotion of community cohesion. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, since 1997, there have been more failing schools than successful ones in my constituency, and that the LEA has been very poor? The fact that parents are choosing to send their children to schools outside Luton is dividing the community and creating poor community cohesion. Will he say more about how community cohesion will be promoted as a result of this Bill?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend repeats what has been people's experience in too many parts of the country. The Bill is aimed at dealing with the problem that she describes. The term "community cohesion" has been used by the Home Office in the past, and it has a specific definition. We believe that that definition sums up what local authorities should aim for in their work with schools and governors to deal with the problem that she identifies.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State accept that fragmenting the governance of schools is a risky enterprise, especially in areas of considerable faith diversity? Is it not likely to imperil community cohesion to a significant extent?

Alan Johnson: No, I do not accept that. We are talking not about fragmenting governing bodies, but about increasing the variety of schools. We want schools in the local authority family to have much more responsibility, and to make decisions for themselves. An exciting agenda is emerging from the proposals that will allow us to address some of the problems described by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran). It will not make those problems worse.

Mr. Chaytor: I accept the argument that trust schools should have a duty to promote community cohesion but, given local authorities' new strategic powers, why is my right hon. Friend resistant to the idea that they should have a similar duty?

Alan Johnson: Local authorities already have that duty. The point made earlier was that a failure to promote community cohesion should be one of the reasons for referring a trust to the schools adjudicator. The Bill contains three such reasons, and I believe that it covers the waterfront in that respect. In no way do the proposals detract from local authorities' responsibility to promote community cohesion and social inclusion.

Finally, Government amendments Nos. 70 to 75 and 84 to 86 are purely drafting changes to ensure that all references in that part of the Bill are consistent. I have tried to do justice to the scope of the amendments in this important group. The changes we are making to define a strategic role for local authorities, to bring parents to the heart of the system and to encourage innovation and new providers are, as I have explained, central to our desire to improve outcomes for children, particularly those from disadvantaged backgrounds.

We believe that the process of debate in which we have been engaged since the White Paper has strengthened our proposals. Our amendments on community schools and community cohesion represent further improvements, and I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to accept them.

Mr. Gibb: I add my congratulations to the Secretary of State on his appointment. He is a sure pair of hands as well as a former higher education Minister and will be adept at resisting pressure from the Labour rebels on the left. On the Opposition Benches at least, we wish him well in his appointment and his new responsibilities.

We had a good and interesting Committee; it was an unusual one for such a controversial and high-profile Bill, as its broad principles were supported by the Opposition. Nevertheless, some significant differences of view were brought out, on which we tried to amend the Bill, tabling about 219 amendments. As well as fundamental differences over the admissions code, the ban on interviews, home-school contracts, charging for school travel and special schools, some of which we shall debate later, we also had differences of view even about the Bill's broad principles. In short, the Opposition are more Government than the Government in respect of the Bill.

The new clause and Government amendment No. 42 both relate to the use of the Secretary of State's veto on whether a local authority can propose a new community school in a competition for a new primary or secondary school. It was of course never part of the Government's original vision that a local authority could propose a new community school, which is why, in a speech on the day before the White Paper was published last October, the Prime Minister said:

> "We need to see every local authority moving from provider to commissioner, so that the system acquires a local dynamism responsive to the needs of their communities and open to change and new forms of school provision.
> This will liberate local authorities from too often feeling the need to defend the status quo, so that instead they become the champions of innovation and diversity."

That was the vision: more diversity among providers of education. But with 63 per cent. of schools already community schools, how will it help to create that diversity if we simply pile on more community schools?

Meg Hillier: The hon Gentleman seems to be contradicting himself. He suggests that every community school is homogenous and that there is only one type. Community, trust, foundation and voluntary-aided schools are different from each other and within each category. Surely we should welcome that diversity on both sides of the House.

Mr. Gibb: That is one form of the diversity that we want, but we also want diversity in structure that will help to create an even more diverse range of schools, which was, I thought, the objective set out in the White Paper. I thought, too, that it was the original judgment of both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State about what was best for the education system. Indeed, on page 116, the White Paper states:

> "We will also remove the right for local authorities to publish their own proposals for the establishment of new community schools."

That was their judgment; it is the judgment of the Government and we share that view on the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Raynsford: Can the hon. Gentleman reconcile the clear statement that his party is opposed to giving local authorities discretion to reach a judgment about what is best for their area with the views being put about by the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), who speaks for his party on local government, and pretends that a Conservative Government would do just that?

Mr. Gibb: This is not an anti-local authority issue, as I will come on to say. Under the White Paper and the Bill, it is still possible for local authorities to propose foundation schools. The issue is not about being anti-local authority or being prescriptive in that respect—I am defending the Government's policy again. The purpose behind the White Paper is to create diversity in the system, but the concessions that the Government have made will hamper that original judgment.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): If the hon. Gentleman and his party were ever to be in power—God forbid—he would have to learn that Governments need to listen. Is it not important that, having listened, we recognise that community schools play an important role in diversity of provision? It is important that that reflects local need and not just what he wants.

Mr. Gibb: Of course, parents will initially set out the determination to have one of the new schools. Those who really want more parental choice should realise that the provisions in the Bill that encourage parents to set up new schools and new providers to come in are the way to create a much more responsive education system—responsive to parents, not just to local authorities.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend understand why Labour Members seem to want to leave the rich with a complete choice of many good schools and to offer no choice to those without sufficient money?

Mr. Gibb: My right hon. Friend makes a good point and his pertinent intervention has encapsulated the history of education reform over the past 40 years.

Meg Hillier: I am driven to rise to my feet again. In Hackney in my constituency, we have a new city academy, to which the Secretary of State referred. It is fully comprehensive and the rich, whom the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) mentioned, want their children to get into it. It is full of children from a diverse range of backgrounds, including poor backgrounds, and is representative of my constituency. That is the sort of school that Labour Members want to see more of. I challenge the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) to say whether he really wants that as well.

Mr. Gibb: I could not agree more with the hon. Lady. That is precisely what Conservative Members want. We want to see more academies such as the Petchey academy in her constituency, more foundation schools with foundations, more trust schools, and more voluntary-aided schools. We want the kind of diversity in our constituencies that she wants in her constituency, and which the Secretary of State wants too.

Paul Farrelly: Clearly, the Bill not only proposes a new form of school, but sets some limits. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, in supporting the Government's policy and the Bill, the Conservative party subscribes to the principle that there should be no further selection by academic ability?

Mr. Gibb: The Conservative party has already set out its position and there will be a debate on admissions tomorrow. We have said that an incoming Conservative Government would not see a return to wholesale selection across the board. We will not see new grammar schools and secondary moderns being established outside areas that do not already have grammar schools.

The White Paper contained a sensible set of proposals, but then Lord Kinnock intervened and 53 Labour rebels eventually went on to vote against the Bill. In their alternative White Paper, they said:

"local authorities should retain the power to decide whether to function solely as commissioners, and not providers, of education. There should be no outright ban on new schools being developed as local authority community schools."

That looming Labour rebellion between the publication of the White Paper last October and the publication of the Bill at the end of February this year resulted in the famous concession letter from the then Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee. In that letter, the Secretary of State said:

"there may be occasions where a community school might best meet local needs. In such cases, if a local authority wished to enter a community school in a competition—and the Secretary of State felt that there was merit in such a proposal—the competition would be judged by the Adjudicator...In judging the competition, the Adjudicator would take into account the track record of the local authority in terms of educational performance, the degree of diversity in the local...system and parental preference."

That represents a complete change of view—a change that was not based on the judgment of the Prime Minister or the then Secretary of State as to what would best serve the interests of this country in creating a high quality education system, but which was occasioned by problems in the Labour party. The change of policy was all about internal Labour party management.

Mr. Marsden: I know that it suits the hon. Gentleman's perspective to present what happened as an enormous concession to a particular group of Labour Members. However, will he reflect on the fact that the letter was sent to the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee on the basis of the report that that Committee produced? Will he also take into account the fact that the then Secretary of State quite rightly took action on the matters that we discovered and discussed and then presented in our report?

Mr. Gibb: Select Committees bring out reports all the time and the Government respond to them, but such reports do not always result in changes to a Bill after a White Paper has been published. What happened was due to the management of the Labour party.

It was not even the case that the proposals had to be changed to get the Bill through the House. Conservative Members always said that they would support the Bill, and we did, which was why it received its Second Reading with a majority of 343. The Government claim that the concessions were made as a result of consultation on the White Paper. They will cite bodies such as the National Union of Teachers and the Local Government Association, but those bodies were always opposed to measures to take away local authorities' ability to establish community schools, regardless of the White Paper. The process thus had nothing to do with consultation.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the NUT is still entirely opposed to any aspect of the Bill that gives greater power to parents to play their part in their children's education and insists that the power should lie in the hands of the NUT and local authorities?

Mr. Gibb: My right hon. Friend makes the point well enough. It is very much a producer-capture situation.

If the Government are claiming that the consultation took place with MPs, we should consider the make-up of the House of Commons. We must assume that all Labour Members, except the 100 who signed the early-day motion, and all Conservative Members supported the proposals to remove the right of local authorities to propose new community schools.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman rightly highlights the fact that the Members who signed the alternative White Paper were all from one party. At the same time, does he accept that the Local Government Association, which set out its opposition to the proposals that he is endorsing, represents all parties and, indeed, has a Conservative majority?

Mr. Gibb: There is a diverse range of views in the Conservative party and we are proud of that fact.

Anne Snelgrove: On diverse views, the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) tabled interesting and informative amendments in Committee, most of which we were happy to vote down and some of which were withdrawn. Those amendments showed that Conservative Members, or at least a considerable number of them, look forward to the return of grammar schools. What is the view of the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) about the split in his party on the Bill?

Mr. Gibb: There are cross-party views on all kinds of education issues. I am speaking for the Opposition, yet defending the White Paper and Bill of the Prime Minister who leads the hon. Lady's party. Let us not talk about splits in the Conservative party when she can see splits all over the Labour Benches. Her point is irrelevant to the important principles behind the Bill.

The Government's excuse about consultation is a smokescreen. In reality, the concessions were made for reasons of internal Labour party management, rather than as part of a considered approach to education reform. We have thus tabled amendments Nos. 101 and 102 and new clauses 53 and 58, which would put back into the Bill the original vision that the Prime Minister set out with clarity, passion and sincerity on 24 October.

New clauses 53 and 58 would simply insert in the Bill the wording used in the White Paper. New clause 58 comes from page 116 of the White Paper and new clause 53 is taken from paragraph 2.5 on page 25, which says:

> "We will encourage all primary and secondary schools to be self-governing and to acquire a Trust."

Throughout our time in Committee, Conservative Members tried to restore the Bill to a form that corresponded to the original vision in the White Paper. As such, if the Government do not accept new clause 53, we hope that it will be possible to press the principles that it sets out to a Division.

The concessions made in the then Secretary of State's letter of 6 February could have provided ample reason for the official Opposition to vote against the Bill's Second Reading on 15 March. Such a vote would have been decisive, because it would have killed the Bill. However, we took the view—and we still hold it—that half a loaf is better than none. The Conservative party is serious about raising the quality of education in our schools. It is unacceptable that, according to the National Audit Office, 23 per cent. of secondary schools are underperforming and a similar proportion is probably coasting. On page 138 of the regulatory impact assessment, the Government consider the four school grading categories used by Ofsted—excellent, good, satisfactory and poor—and say:

> "'Satisfactory' is no longer good enough—as that may mean that some children will not achieve their full potential."

We agree. We have moved into a global jobs market, in which prosperity for individuals and the country depends on the acquisition of a high-quality knowledge-based education, and that is why we take education reform seriously.

It is not just a matter of economics. A thorough education enables us to enjoy life to the full and to appreciate and contribute to our culture. The Bill, with all its flaws and concessions, is still a step in the right direction. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said, when the Government do the right thing, we will support them. The concept of trust schools is right. On Second Reading, we accepted the concession that local authorities could, subject to agreement by the Secretary of State, propose a community school as part of a competition for a new school. It was an unnecessary concession, but we accepted it rather than lose the Bill. Under the White Paper proposals, local authorities can, as I said earlier, propose a foundation school. This is not an anti-local authority issue—it is about creating a more diverse range of provision. We therefore listened carefully to the right hon. Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), the then Minister for Schools, when she clarified in Committee when the Secretary of State would or would not exercise the veto. We did not want her clarification to amount to further unnecessary concessions to the Labour left. We wanted to be sure that the principle behind the use of the veto was in line with the principle established by the letter from the previous Secretary of State and by the Government's response to the Select Committee report. In that response, which was published on 6 February, three weeks before the publication of the Bill, the Government said:

> "Where a local authority with a good track record in education proposes a community school...the Secretary of State will not normally intervene."

We are happy that the concessions are in line with those principles.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I wish to declare my interest as a member of Tameside metropolitan borough council, and to draw to the attention of the House the fact that my wife is the council cabinet member responsible for services to children and young people. Returning to the role of local education authorities, it is not inconceivable that a very good local authority with an excellent track record of providing community schools should be responsible for a diverse group of schools, whether foundation schools, city academies or trust schools. Under the provisions, might it not want to propose a community school, because that is precisely what the community wants?

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, which is why we are not averse to supporting the Bill with those concessions in it. The main purpose of the White Paper is to try to create a greater diversity of schools throughout the country. A total of 63 per cent. of schools are community schools, so we will not create diversity if every new school is yet another community school. With school rolls and population demand falling, the number of new schools is lower than we might otherwise wish. On 20 April, the then Minister for Schools said in Committee that a local authority with an annual performance assessment of 4—the highest level—could propose a community school without consent. There are 11 such authorities. She said, too, that the worst local authorities with an APA of 1 would never be able to propose a new community school. For the remainder, it would depend on the diversity of provision in the area and the quality of the schools that they provide.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I share my hon. Friend's satisfaction that the Bill has been amended as it has. Is it not the adjudicator who will make the decision, and will the adjudicator not sing to tune of the Secretary of State, if not of No. 10, in deciding whether to go for a bog-standard community school or one of the new diverse schools that the Prime Minister clearly wants?

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, which I wish I had made myself. When there is a competition in which the local authorities take part, they are no longer the judge, the matter is referred to the adjudicator, and it is for him to decide whether the school will go ahead. I hope very much that he will err on the side of diversity in making those decisions.

Jon Trickett: I listened carefully to the Secretary of State, who offered a welcome clarification of the principle of diversity. He clearly stated that diversity would be defined by him and by the adjudicator to cover ethos, not necessarily governance. That is a major shift by the Government—a major clarification. Will the hon. Gentleman still vote with the Government on Third Reading? Will he not join us now and try to defeat the Bill?

Mr. Gibb: People are more interested in how the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will vote tomorrow than in how the Opposition will vote. We have adopted one of the principles from the Minister's clarification. Where local authorities do not have a diverse range of schools, or where more than 15 per cent. of schools in a local authority area are of poor quality, our new clause 18 would provide that a local authority must publish a notice under clause 7 inviting proposals for a new school. Where the range of schools in a local authority area is of poor quality, it is unacceptable that those schools can languish year after year, providing a substandard education to our children. Children have only one chance of an education, and we cannot stand idly by while local authorities preside over such provision.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): May I take the hon. Gentleman back to a comment that he made about local education authorities that have an annual performance assessment of 1? He said that they would be not allowed to submit an application for a community school. That is not correct. My LEA, unfortunately, would fall into the category of having an APA of 1, but with the strides that it is making, it may well have the opportunity to make such an application in future.

Mr. Gibb: Of course. I meant that if the local education authority ceased to have that poor rating of 1 it would fall into another category, but if it remained in category 1, it would never be able to establish a community school.

Judy Mallaber: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there can be a diverse range of ethoses and styles of schools, even when they are all community schools? Does he also accept that a community school such as Aldercar in my constituency, which used to have an A to C attainment level of 19 per cent. and now has one of 60 per cent., can pull itself up by its bootstraps with an excellent head, an excellent team and an excellent supportive local authority, but remain a community school, although with a specialism in languages? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that that is possible?

Mr. Gibb: Of course I accept that. The then Minister for Schools told us that the plural of ethos is ethoi, so we all learn something in Committee. If we want to accelerate the diversity of ethoi and school provision, the best way to achieve that is through a diversity of structural approaches to schools. Even after the Bill has been in force for several years, there will still be plenty of community schools and they will still probably be the majority type of school in Britain.

Helen Jones: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about the need to tackle failing schools, which is shared in all parts of the House. However, he seems to be making a simplistic link by saying that the only way to improve schools is for them to be something other than community schools. May I remind him what the Select Committee found in its inquiry? It stated:

"No causal link has been demonstrated between external partners and the success of a school, or between the independence of a school from local authority control and its success."

Is the matter not far more complicated than he portrays? The success of schools depends on good heads and good teachers. It is not necessarily related to the type of school.

Mr. Gibb: Of course, the hon. Lady is right. Conservative Members have never said that we can solve all the problems in our state education system by passing this Bill and introducing a variety of structural provision. There are a huge number of issues related to the curriculum, ethos, discipline, quality of teaching and quality of heads. The variety of structural provision is only one element, but let us not deny ourselves that element, because it is important.

5.15 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman was a member of the Education and Skills Committee and signed up to the report quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones). When he was a member of our Committee, he was not known for giving the impression that all the schools up and down our country were underperforming, miserable places where children do not get a proper chance at education. I thought that he agreed that many fine community schools do a very good job for their children. Is he not doing himself a disservice by making a speech redolent of the Chris Woodhead philosophy, rather than the philosophy that he held only a few months ago?

Mr. Gibb: I still hold the philosophy to which the hon. Gentleman refers. In my time as shadow education spokesman, I have visited many good community schools and state schools around the country. I am not talking about all schools; I am talking about the 23 per cent. of schools to which the National Audit Office has referred, and the similar percentage of coasting schools. We must tackle those schools.

Clauses 3 and 7 are significant, and they are the principal reasons why we support this Bill. They enable parents to make representations to the local authority calling on it to establish a new school because they are dissatisfied by the quantity or quality of existing provision. We hope that over the next few years we will see the establishment of a large number of trust schools with greater autonomy and independence in their day-to-day running.

The Thomas Telford city technology college in Telford, Shropshire, is not a trust school—it is a CTC, which is similar to the academy model—but the principle of autonomy in the day-to-day running of the school is similar. The principal of that school, Sir Kevin Satchwell, has told me that one of the great advantages of CTC status is that heads do not have to attend interminable meetings with the local authority, which means that they can stay in school and focus on raising standards. That is why at the Thomas Telford school, which has an intake of all abilities and in which 11 per cent. of pupils are entitled to free school meals, 100 per cent. of pupils achieve not only five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, but 12 or more GCSEs or equivalent at grades A* to C. Even when one strips out the GNVQs, it is still the best performing comprehensive school in the country—as I have said, 100 per cent. of pupils achieve five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, including English and Maths. That is what autonomy can achieve, which is why the Conservative party is so serious about the benefits of the Bill and so excited about the prospect of hundreds of trust schools being established in the years ahead.

It became clear in Committee that the Government, too, are serious about promoting new trust schools and helping parents.

Frank Dobson: In view of the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the school in Telford, does he believe that if every school in and around Telford had similar status, they would all achieve the 100 per cent. ratings that he has discussed?

Mr. Gibb: That would be an exaggeration. The Thomas Telford school has high-quality leadership, but it would help if schools were given autonomy. Some 66 per cent. of pupils in schools with CTC status achieve five or more good GCSEs at grades A* to C, which, while it is not the same as the 100 per cent. rating at the Thomas Telford school, is significantly higher than the national average and higher than the average for community schools.

In Committee, it became clear how much in favour of promoting such schools the Government are. Paragraph 30 of the draft guidance on clause 3 states:

> "Where the level of parental demand for a new school appears to be considerable and where a group of parent promoters come forward then the local authority should offer help and support for parents in developing their proposals."

Paragraph 34 says:

> "The kind of material help and support which local authorities should offer includes dedicated consultancy support".

Paragraph 35 goes on to say:

> "In helping to develop and facilitate proposals local authorities should be flexible in earmarking potential sites and creative in removing capital barriers."

We regard that guidance as very helpful, which is why we incorporated it into new clause 22.

I cited those paragraphs not to annoy those on the left who believe that local authorities should run all schools directly, and that all schools should be the same homogenous bog standard, but to assure my hon. Friends—

Angela Eagle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gibb: Not at the moment.
